Look at this picture and read.

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a housekeeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility.

One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1891.

No. 1

The broadening of the light is like a strain
Of me low music from a golden horn
Set to the huntsman's lips, who now is fain
To play hunting up, and wake the drowsy morn.
—Richard Burton.

Worcester is a central city.

This is never more evident than when New England repairs hither to attend the Fair.

That strangers have been in our midst during the past week was evident, not only on the Agricultural grounds but in our streets and places of business.

Again, the return of many people to their homes from their regular summer's outing has had its effect in filling up our ways, but they would come, any way, for schools are to begin.

Instead of beginning on Monday as they used to, years ago, they now wait for Labor Day and Tuesday is the advertised time for trouble to commence. The proverbially shining faces are considerably browned by exposure, but the owners thereof are in good trim for work.

But settling down to school restraint after vacation liberty is no easy matter. Visions of mountain and seashore freedom will dance before youthful eyes for many a day. Hard work now, however, will obviate crowding and pushing when the end of the coming year approaches. Better push than be pushed.

After all, we are not wholly given up to school; but it must be confessed that much of modern American custom is effected by the keeping of school. We can't go here nor there; we can't do this nor that because the children are in school, and by the time our children are out, some other parents' are in and there is no end. The line is everlasting.

But aside from school, we have societies and institutions whose end is the public good and they too begin, again, their active labors, now that folks are home once more. Strange, that with so much engineering for doing good any evil should exist; but it does and it is aggressively present. Our license era is bringing an expected fruitage. Only recently, a laboring man, between two policemen was on his way along Main Street to the lockup. Crows followed and close to the culprit were five well dressed girls of twelve or thirteen. What a school for young misses to whom such sights should be absolutely unknown.

Till this year of license, there were children in Worcester who had never seen a drunken man. If, as license advocates claim drunkenness is less with license than without it why do we have the results, thus chronicled? The figures are constantly mounting up and poverty in certain sections daily grows more pronounced. And worst of all our young people are growing accustomed to the sight of intoxicated men, yes, and women, too. Thus often seen, they will grow to say "Only a drunk." No surer indication of moral indifference exists than the flippant use of those words.

Far rather would we prefer to see eyes transfixed with horror at the sight of a fellow mortal, whose mind, beclouded with drink, is ready for any crime. "Only a drunk" means a possibility of any crime that the Decalogue forbids and against which the face of all society is supposed to be turned. A wild beast, loose in our midst, or a mad dog running at large would make men wild with anxiety, but "Only a drunk" has in it all the venom of the frenzied dog and the ferocity of the escaped and untamed brute.

No, No! Let there be no palliation of this terrible evil, no condoning it on account of heredity nor any of the excuses, today, so common. Ye, who have clean hands and pure hearts and have not lifted up your souls unto vanity, speak in no uncertain tones, that this monstrous evil of drink may suffer the ignominy that it deserves. Extend helping hands when necessary, but what is far better, leave no means unemployed, which shall prevent the spread of this terrible evil. There is good enough in the land to suppress the bad. Why isn't it done?

As to the recent discussion in the Detroit G. A. R. Encampment on the Color Line, it might be stated further that on a visit to New Orleans at the time of the Cotton Centennial, I visited Joseph H. Mower Post, G. A. R. and at the same time as the honored guest was received the Ass't Adj't General of the Department of Louisiana. "For the good of the order," he responded saying, "I have to say for your pleasure that the requests from colored veterans, for the format on of colored posts have been pigeon holed and they will stay thus as long as I continue in my present office." Long and loud was the cheering that followed. I must confess that I was astonished that men who had imperiled life for the nation should be thus summarily cut off from the privilege of wearing a G. A. R. button. By way of explanation I was told the old story of social equality which could not be tolerated. It seems, however, that posts were formed later. Queer that black and white could fight in the same field. No white regiment objected to the blacks going in at the Crater in '64. They stopped a good many bullets.

President Lincoln must have anticipated some such action as that at Detroit for during the War he uttered the following telling words: "When peace with victory comes, there will be some black men who will remember that with silent tongue, and clenched teeth, and steady eye, and well poised bayonet, they have helped on mankind to this great consummation; while I fear there will be some white ones unable to forget that with malignant heart and deceitful speech they have striven to hinder and prevent it."

About Folks.

The Festival Chorus is doing excellent work preparatory to the great musical event of this month.

Dr. Fred Scott, who went from W. H. S. to Brown University and thence to Jefferson Medical College is enjoying an excellent practice in Kimball, South Dakota. His rides are long but enjoyable and the air is perfect.

Arthur H. Bellows of Barnard, Sumner & Co., has returned from his vacation.

General A. B. R. Sprague came out of the Bay State house, Tuesday evening, to find his horse missing. Some one, mistaking it for an ordered delivery, had driven it away. Though explanations were ample, such affairs ruffle the best of tempers.

Miss Charlotte A. Maynard, a graduate of our High School and of the Framingham Normal School and who for the last two years has taught in West Brookfield will spend the next year in Miss Bennett's Private School in Irvington, New York. This is a beautiful place, about twenty miles from New York City. It is the summer home of Jay Gould and is the station at which visitors to Sunnyside leave the cars. Miss Bennett was one of Miss Maynard's teachers in Framingham and it is highly complimentary to our Worcester girl, that she is thus sought out by her old instructor. Miss Maynard is a daughter of Mander A. Maynard of William Street.

Miss Clemmie Sheldon, lately teaching in Weston, is now in West Brookfield, assistant in the High School. She is a W. H. S. graduate and has had the full and supplementary courses at the Framingham Normal.

Lake Chau — Etc.

The ten young ladies with their chaperones, who have been camping in Mr. Howard's cottage, on Long Island, Lake Chaugogagogmanchaugagoggungamaug, broke camp last Monday, after two weeks of great enjoyment. Last Saturday evening they entertained about twenty-five of their friends. The house and grounds were prettily decorated with lanterns and flowers, while on the shore, was a large bon-fire which added greatly to the evening's pleasure. After a short entertainment, ice-cream and cake were served, the party breaking up near midnight. Each guest was given a souvenir on which was the camp-name, O-so-cool, and the yell, which has been heard often during the past two weeks. It must be a great calm has followed the departure of the campers. A feature of the two weeks has been the Chronicle which has been faithfully kept by one of the young ladies, recording each days events and wittily disclosing the characteristics of the several campers.

LIGHT is almost daily besought to recommend young men for good situations. This we are more than willing to do, but the most of our High School acquaintances are already placed. To keep our stock of names good we should like some new ones. So then, just call on us, and let us know your merits that the business men of our city may be helped thereby and that you may get good places to labor in.

Every Ninth Grade pupil in Worcester should have a copy of Principal Mooney's Book. Read the advertisement under Books and Bookmen. It will be of great advantage in the final examinations.

A Genuine Sensation.

The resignation of George H. Howland from the superintendency of the Chicago schools is the most noteworthy educational item of the Summer. Mr. Howland has held this place since 1880 and for twenty years before that he had been principal of the High School. No man was better known in educational circles than he and, certainly, no one was more respected and appreciated. He brought the schools of Chicago to a most enviable eminence. Ill health is the cause of his resignation. He will now take a trip to Europe for rest and recuperation. He is a double cousin of Dr. A. A. Howland of this city, as their fathers were brothers and their mothers, sisters. He was born in the town of Conway, was graduated at Amherst in 1850 and, for several years, was a tutor in that college. In 1857, he went to Chicago, and has been there ever since. The Chicago Tribune says:

"If in no other direction he should be remembered as the man who has persistently Americanized our public schools. I mean that he has diverted the public school from the craze which tended to establish foreign methods. He has made the study of the English language the paramount consideration. He believed it the leading province of the public school to perfect children in the use of the mother tongue. He has made it possible for a foreign child to enter our schools and when retiring to speak the English language as clearly and as correctly as any of the native born. In this he has Americanized the pupil and has inculcated a spirit of patriotism and a scope of intelligence which cannot but redound to the credit and benefit of the country. George Howland is a patriot. His management of public schools has been eminently wise, and, notwithstanding the varied complexions of the boards which have come and gone since his incumbency, he has been invariably sustained. He retires with no shadow to darken the brightness of his long service."

There will be a lively scramble for his place, equal to the late contest in Philadelphia. Wonder if Massachusetts will furnish any candidates?

Kindergartens.

At the home of Mr. Luther M. Lovell, No. 1 Dix Street, Saturday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, there will be a gathering of citizens who are interested in the system of Kindergartens. Miss Symonds of Boston, who has had much experience in this kind of work, will read an essay and remarks are expected from others who have hearts in this project. Kindergartens have the endorsement of the most advanced minds that are dealing in educational matters and Worcester is behind her sister cities in appreciation. It is hoped that many may avail themselves of this opportunity to gain information as to the best way to lead the children.

Holy Cross.

Rev. John Gavin, W. H. S. '76, Holy Cross '79, has been assigned as pastor of the Catholic Church at Amherst.

THE NEW ENGLAND FAIR.

Once more the New England Agricultural Society has united with the Worcester Agricultural Society in holding its annual fair in this city. The success which has attended the fairs when held here and the failure met with when they have been elsewhere will undoubtedly lead in time to their permanent location in Worcester.

This week's fair, the twenty-fifth annual, held by the New England Society and the seventy-third annual held by the Worcester Society, has been fully equal to any ever held both in the extent of the exhibits and the number of people in attendance. Whether it surpasses all others or not is difficult to tell at the time of this writing.

The opening day there was not a very large attendance on account of the unfavorable weather. The day's program was carried out, however, with the exception of the illumination which was postponed to Friday evening. With Wednesday morning came fair weather and with it the crowds. As is usual, Thursday saw the largest attendance. It is estimated that over 25,000 people visited the fair Thursday.

Save in one or two departments there were more exhibits than ever before.

Both the halls were filled to their utmost capacity. The first floor of the south hall was devoted to the tradesmen. On the second floor were the flowers and fruits, the former display being particularly fine. On the first floor of the north hall were the vegetables and floor of the north hall was more fancy work, paintings, etc., and the exhibits of the furniture and carpet merchants and of musical instruments.

The exhibition of cattle was about the same as usual. There were more than the usual number of sheep, but less swine. The poultry exhibit was very fine as was also the display of farming machinery. There was a large exhibit of horses. The trotting races were good and were thoroughly appreciated by the crowd, the grand stand being always filled from one end to the other.

The special attractions were fully equal to what the management promised. The balloon ascensions and parachute descents were the finest ever given in this city.

The crowds were delighted with the exhibition given by Mme. Maratette with her trained horses. The book and ladder tournament and the prize drill drew large crowds. The Natick company was the winner in the Farmer and the South Providence Temperance Cadets in the latter. The fair closed Friday evening with a display of fireworks, which was postponed from Monday evening.

This fair is simply one more triumph added to the already long list, which will soon make Worcester the permanent location of this, the greatest fair in New England.

Samuel E. Winslow.

The present chairman of the Republican City Committee though in the second year of his office is still one of the youngest men who ever held the position, in Worcester. In fact, 1837, when Rockwood Hoar was Chairman, seems about the only year, lately, when the interests of the party were committed to a very young man, 'till 1890. The results of that Campaign, so far as this City was concerned, were so satisfactory that the Committee re-organized and continued Mr. Winslow at its head.

He is of Worcester birth and rearing, having started life here, April—1802, the son of Hon. Samuel and Mary Weeks Winslow. His parents need no introduction, his father having been, so recently the four times mayor of our city. The name proclaims its Old Colony origin. Like all well constituted Worcester boys, Samuel E. went through the Public Schools, graduating from the High in 1820. Afterward, he was one year in Williston Academy at East Hampton, under Principal Fairbanks who went from Worcester in 1878. Entering Harvard College in 1821, he passed his four years in Cambridge, getting therefrom as much satisfaction, possibly, as any young man who ever represented Worcester in that institution of learning. In many ways, his was a conspicuous figure there, thus early indicating the executive faculty.

In foot ball, he was center rush on the university eleven, but it was in base ball that he won his greatest distinction. He was on the Nine four years and during the last year was Captain. Under his direction, the Club played 26 games, losing only one in the entire number. They played 15 College games, winning all, and to Championship games, with the same record. The only game lost was the one played with a scrub nine from Cochrutuate. They should have had Dr. Holmes there, to write another poem on "How the Old Horse won the Bet."

In 1834, he was the chairman of the Committee having in charge the Blaine Torch Light Procession of Harvard students when 1200 college men marched in line. Our Worcester boy was Drum major and so headed the array.

In College, Clubs, he was a member of the Zeta Psi, the D. K. F., and the Hasty Pudding Clubs; of the latter body he was the business manager when the club made a theatrical trip to Boston and New York.

He was Financial Editor of the Daily Crimson three months, resigning to become business manager of the Lampon with which he was connected two and a half years; but perhaps the crowning honor of his course was the chairmanship of the Class Day Committee, by common consent the highest position to be attained by the suffrages of Harvard Seniors.

Then came a seven months trip to Europe, extending along to February, 1836. In this time, he saw Great Britain, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Russia, Germany and France. He was in St. Petersburg, Moscow and Warsaw and from some places wrote letters home that secured a wide reading in our local papers: all the more, possibly, because they were not intended for publication.

Returning to Worcester, he entered business with his father. The manufacturing of skates was begun here in 1836 and just thirty years after or in 1866, the business was incorporated with Mr. Samuel E. Winslow as Secretary and Clerk. In February, 1838, with Mr. Albert B. Curtis of Springfield he began the manufacturing of machine screws, a business still maintained.

Mr. Winslow was married, April 17—1839, to Miss Bertha, daughter of Colonel E. J. Russell, now Probation Officer of the Central District Court. Their Summer abode is in Leicester, on the famous Stonewall Farm where two children have come to grace and bless their home.

In 1850, Governor Brackett made Mr. Winslow an aid with the rank of Colonel and the Worcester people thought the uniform became him nicely and that the Governor had shown excellent judgement in selecting, at least, one member of his military family.

In local organizations, the Colonel's name is found on the rolls of its Worcester Club, the Quinsigamond Boat Club, the Athletic and Art Clubs and the Horticultural Society. He was the manager of the last presentation of the Talesman, as given by the Quinsigamond Club.

Colonel Winslow's entrance into politics was made in 1839 as a member of the City Committee from ward 8. The next year viz., 1890, he was chairman of the Committee and he threw himself into the contest with so much vigor and ardor that he merited and won the commendation of all members of his party. Realizing that business methods should obtain in Headquarters as well as elsewhere, he gave nearly his whole time during the campaign to the office and its details. Following the close of the municipal contest, the Committee issued to every contributor to the funds a circular or financial statement accounting for the disbursement of every cent during the campaign. This had never been done before and though the expenses were very heavy there was a small balance left in the treasury. If this be an augury for the campaign, about to open, it looks as though the Republicans were making a good start. Under the direction of chairman Winslow, there will be no lagging.

In his office, he has a good array of predecessors. Going back to 1834, the memorable Blaine—Cleveland fight, we find H. J. Jennings Chairman with A. P. Christy, Secretary. From that time to date, the offices have been as follows:—

CHAIRMAN.	SECRETARY.
1835, S. E. Hildreth.	G. H. Fernald.
1836, E. B. Crane.	W. L. Robinson.
1837, Rockwood Hoar.	E. B. Glasgow.
1838, E. B. Glasgow.	W. B. Sprout.
1839, C. G. Parker.	L. J. Goodell.
1840, S. E. Winslow.	I. S. Haskell.
1841, S. E. Winslow.	H. S. Haskell.

The Committee has opened Headquarters for the Fall Campaign in Rooms 12 and 13, Burnside Building, the Rooms, hitherto, occupied by LIGHT, and here will be formulated the plans for the contest, about to begin.

The "Thirty Sixth."

No Worcester County regiment covered so much territory during the War as did this one whose annual reunion took place in Continental Hall last Wednesday. Col. Wm. M. Olin, Secretary of the Commonwealth presided and a capital presiding officer he is. The business meeting brought together a large number of the survivors, nearly 200 in all. It was voted to hold the next meeting in Leominster and the following were elected as officers for the ensuing year: President, George A. Perley, Palmer; Vice Presidents—John A. Rice, Worcester, W. C. Penniman, Westborough; Secretary and Treasurer, David Boyden, Worcester; Chaplain, A. A. White, Worcester; Auditing Committee—Maj. E. T. Raymond, Worcester, George A. Wood, Worcester, T. J. Ames, Leominster; Executive Committee—T. J. Ames, George R. Damon and Solon H. Carter, all of Leominster.

These comrades had varied during the year past: Dr. Warner Tyler, Fred S. Gates, William G. Carlton, John G. Hall, Martin Richards, James L. Brigham and Elliott D. Stone.

As the 36th admits to membership the sons of veterans the ranks are constantly increased by such accessions. This time Edwin R. Olin, George W. Barker, and Charles C. More were admitted to honorary membership.

At a quarter before one, the line was formed to march over to G. A. R. Hall, where the ladies of the Relief Corps had prepared a bountiful repast. Under the command of their old colonel, Gen. W. F. Draper, the long array of veterans, filed across Main street and up the stairs to the drum beat of H. O. Moore of Lynn, once a drummer in the regiment, now the Ass't. Adj't. Gen'l of the Department, G. A. R.

Nothing could be better than the service in the hall, and no wonder that the "boys" voted the reunion the best ever held, for a good dinner has a wonderfully enlivening effect.

Following the food, President Olin rapped to order and in the happiest manner possible, introduced the post prandial exercises. The first speaker was Capt. "Jack" Adams of Lynn, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives. Capt. Adams is easily the king of after dinner speakers and every sentence was followed by roars of laughter. After him came remarks by Capt. John Anderson of the Regular Army, Capt. A. A. White, Maj. Wm. H. Hodgkins, Alfred S. Roe, Gen. W. F. Draper, G. F. Crafts, J. T. Priest, C. W. Wood and T. L. Barker. During these exercises a committee consisting of C. W. Wood, H. A. Kimball, L. K. Davy and W. H. Hodgkins was appointed to extend congratulations to the Womens association of the 36th regiment then in session in Sons of Veterans hall. Later the committee reported in glowing terms, the result of their mission. The son and daughter of the late Col. A. Goodell presented photographs of the father to the survivors of his old Company C.

The ladies of the Relief Corps in charge of the collation were Mrs. Sarah E. Towle, chairman; Mrs. Esther A. Parker, Mrs. Mary J. Montague, Mrs. Harriet Lawrence, Mrs. Lucretia Morse, Mrs. Mary A. Mills, Mrs. Jennie Sproul, Mrs. Lydia A. Bigelow and Mrs. Adaline Lynde. The dinner was declared by the veterans to be the best ever served at a regimental reunion.

At a quarter past three, the day was done and memories will take a rest for a year.

Books and Bookmen.

Liberty and Life.

Discourses by E. P. Powell. Chicago, Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn St. In paper 50 cents.

This book is No. 6 in the Unity Library Series. Delivered to a regular audience, probably, on Sunday they might be called sermons but the author seems to prefer the word, discourses. Whatever they are called, here are seventeen chapters full of thought, reason, conclusion and suggestion. There is nothing of doubt in Mr. Powell's processes. From first to last he has all the decision and firmness of Pythagoras. To the intellects addressed by him, his essays would be prompting and helpful; but there is a level away down below those whom he meets; there are millions of men who know little of Darwin and much less of Buddha and Confucius and to them all of Mr. Powell's fine words would be like sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. His discourses are away, over the heads of more than one half of humanity. He takes occasion to slur the Salvation Army several times, forgetting that such measures as those of the Army make men better, that they lift them out of filth and degradation and start them on an upward course. In time they may climb to where they can comprehend Mr. Powell's wisdom. Evangelical Christians will find in the book much to criticize but they will also find that it contains much that may make even them better. All the thoughts are expressed in the clearest manner and the element of Common Sense is a pervading one. As sermons, they would not be classed with some of a certain Brooklyn Divine's and Mr. Powell surely would not wish them to be, but throughout the book there is a manifest disposition to excite good deeds and good living. Sin is set forth as, first of all, falsehood to ourselves who are the chief sufferers, and sin may be mental, moral or physical. Popular crazes are depicted in colors that should warn those who have tendencies to reap more than they have sown. In his final chapter, we have a Looking Backward fancy that out-Bellamy Bellamy. Yet, after all, it may come about, or something, like it. In conclusion, "Liberty and Life" is intensely virile. There is enough of energy and strength in it for half a dozen books and the reader who follows it closely will find some of the author's spirit insensibly transferred to himself. It is a book that elevates and inspires.

Edmund Burke.

Speeches in the American War, and letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol, with Introduction and Notes by A. J. George. A. M. Boston, D. C. Heath & Co., 1894. 50 cents.

Burke was an encyclopaedia of knowledge. When he opened his mouth to speak, he seldom wanted hearers. Like Macaulay, he overflowed with information. To Americans, his name is specially dear on account of his attitude toward the colonies during the Revolution. His utterances in Parliament, at this period, Mr. George has arranged in order and has supplemented with notes and with certain biographical data. As the compiler is, himself, a practical teacher, he knows just what to put into the hands of pupils. There is no question but that this small volume of speeches will be an important adjunct in the study of American history. No one book has everything. Burke's speeches will prove a valuable side light on the great subject of American Independence. The notes indicate extensive research and the biographical data are sufficient to properly divert the student.

St. Nicholas, conducted by Mary Mapes Dodge. The Century Co., New York.

The story of Toby Trafford is luckily among the first pages for everybody turns to see if the mystery of the burning wharf has been solved, and pleasure at the confessions and wonder as to what Toby will have happen to him next fills the reader's mind. A funny story of a clock comes next, and then an article on Folk lore of the New Mexican Indians. A story of Block Island will bring out the sympathies of its boy readers, and there are three chapters full of thrilling interest of the continued Chan Ok. A legend, if it may be called that, of how the Isle of Syke obtained its name being a Vermont story, a bit of the prairie, and some more of the Swimming Hole Stories, and a wonderful plan of two little boys who are to race for mamma's old medals and silver cup is odd, though not so funny for them. The beetle undertaker is fully described. The pages for the very little folks and those of Jack in the Pulpit with the letters and puzzles make up the main portion of the book, but no doubt every one will read the poems, and how the children will enjoy the lost pet in the great cornfield which is the first story in this number. All the big boys are interested in boats and there are a few pages telling how to choose one, full of hints about the matter. The subscription price is $3 or 25 cents per number and we think it worth the money.

Wide Awake from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, Mass.

The Wide Awake Postoffice, and Tangles, occupy the early pages of this number. The frontispiece of Little Girls and its accompanying story are fine. A sketch of the Prince Imperial has several pages, and gives incidents throughout his short life. There are five illustrations. Two fishermen, an old and a young one, give the doings of a day. An Odd Set will interest anyone who cares for pets, or the funny doings of insects or animals. A story of hat birds and wings will, I hope convert all the girl readers who have not already seen how foolish as well as cruel is a fashion of that kind. Aunt Betsy's cap lost for years is one of the short stories and a picture of baby leopards and how they are cared for, an article on bananas, and a lesson on drowning with all the necessary illustrations, occupies several pages. The continued stories carry us a little further leaving us just where we want to hear only a column more to make it all right. There are short stories and poems and not least entertaining are the pages of Men and Things. This magazine contains a deal of instructive matter and is only $2 per year.

"The Pansy" from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, Mass.

As with all the publications in magazine form by this firm this is good clear though. We do not have to read all the stories to know whether it is wholesome for our children; we can put it into the little hands on Sunday and feel perfectly secure that only the best company is with them. The "Exact Truth" and "Cobweb Chains" are both fine stories and carry each a lesson. A chapter of Twenty Minutes Late does not yet bring Caroline home but the Frisbie school is likely to have uniforms and a band to wear them. The other pages containing pictures, poems, short articles, and letters, are all calculated to please their readers. Price per year $1.

"The Century's" Life of Columbus.

The Century Magazine will celebrate the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America by publishing a Life of Columbus written especially for that magazine by Emilio Castelar, the famous Spanish orator, statesman, and author. The work is written in Spanish, and will be carefully translated. Senor Castelar, whose interest in America and admiration for it are well known, has made a careful study of the new historical material bearing upon the subject, and it is said that his papers will be very richly illustrated. Other articles dealing with the discovery of America are in course of preparation for the same magazine.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, will issue this month Racine's Esther, edited with introduction, notes and appendices by I. H. B. Spiers, Senior Assistant Master, William Penn Charter School, Philadelphia. The introductory notes briefly refer the author and tragedy to their historical place and setting. The appendices set forth the elementary rules of French versification, without some acquaintance with which much of the formal beauty of the poem is lost, and also tabulate a few of the main difficulties of syntax for ready reference from the text.

Richard Watson Gilder, accompanied by his family, is quartered at Marion, Mass., enjoying the comforts of rural life and the luxury of editing the Century from a distance. Marion is a delightful spot, where Mr. Gilder thinks he does his best, certainly his easiest work,—for here he is safe from that peculiarly obnoxious style of crank who seems to feel that he is divinely commissioned to administer pointers to editors and fill up their otherwise unoccupied time with the asking of flippancy and useless questions. Mr. Gilder's study at Marion is about the quaintest structure a magazine editor ever possessed. Formerly it was a kerosene-oil refinery, which alone is enough to guarantee that it is strongly built. It is a square pile of massive stone blocks, and externally only needs graded windows to pass for a jail. Once within doors nothing strikes the eye but tasteful and exquisite elegance. Mrs. Gilder, who excels as an artist, shares her husband's study with him; and as he is one of those old fashioned fellows who loves his wife ardently and doesn't care a rap who knows it, it would be safe to wager that they regard their summer study a little short of paradise.

The autobiography left by Marshal Moltke is described as "comprising twenty-nine diaries, which cover almost the whole of his military career and are replete with all the events in which the great soldier was in any way mixed up. These diaries give a vivid illustration of Moltke's character, and were originally intended for the perusal of his family only."

A New York correspondent of the Syracuse Journal writes:

The failure of Charles T. Dillingham, long known in the book trade, is not an indication of the tight money market alone. It is a most significant sign of something else, something that the publishers and booksellers well understand. Dillingham was a wholesale jobber in books. He made it his business to take the books from the manufacturers and dispose of them to the retailers. Nearly all his customers were dealers in small towns. The number of this class has been slowly falling off. The village book-seller has been driven out of the business. Even the keepers of stationery stores are reluctant to keep books in stock. The big wholesale houses have absorbed the retailers' trade. Nine out of ten persons, except those purchasing school books, now get their books by mail or express, or else do not buy at all till they can visit the publishers' stores in person and make a selection.

Among the manuscripts left by the late Count von Moltke, Prof. Felix Dahn, his biographer, has found a "Confession of Faith." The great marshal affirms his belief in God and a future life. The "Confession" will be published among the other works.

NORTH GRAFTON, MASS., Aug. 31st, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly permit me a little space in your paper in regard to the notice which appeared in its issue of the 29th "Der Mensch denkt, Gott lenkt" viz. "Man proposes, God disposes." The author, Julius Kirschbaker is a native of Solingen, Germany, a shoe-maker by trade, having been apprenticed at the age of twelve, and at present a resident of New Bedford, Bristol County, Mass., where he carries on his trade of making and repairing shoes. During his long years of toil and labor, he has also managed to become the author of some thirty plays, and an almost endless collection of Poems and Essays, (a regular Hans Sacks of America) and not until a few months ago has he ever seen any of his writings in print. Last May, I succeeded in the publication of "Der Mensch denkt, Gott lenkt", which is now in the hands of the German Dramatic Society of Leipzig, who are undertaking its sale. It has thus far been favorably received and we predict a positive recognition. It is free from anything of the sensational order and contains the action and enthusiasm of the good old German stage. It is a tale of love, an exposition of the power and influence of money, together with that supremacy of God over Man, which gives the significance of the title "Man proposes and God disposes". We wish the good old German Shoemaker the success he so well deserves; who in his long hours of labor with his no-wise tasteful occupation, has found time to heed the whisperings of a far higher calling, and an every day fulfillment of the practicability of the other—"Gluck auf dem weg."

HERK CHERRYTREE.

The September Atlantic is well filled with readable matter. If the Contributors Club is not quite so extensive as in some former numbers, it is not the editor's fault. The experience in recollecting is in direct keeping with the principles of Mental Philosophy, where it is stated that nothing really learned is ever forgotten. It may be covered with slush and attic rubbish, so to speak, but it is still there.

Obviously, the editor considers the story by Rudyard Kipling his chief glory, but there are many Atlantic readers who would rate other articles in the number before "A Disturber of Traffic." After one's reputation is made, he may lie abed till noon and, just now, Kipling is the craze. Were it otherwise, it is possible that this story might have gone begging for acceptance. "An Innocent Life" is a better story, far, than Mr. Kipling's, but the writer has not that bubble, reputation. "Dyer's Hollow" is a fine bit of out-of-doors description, taking us to Cape Cod and over the scenes that H. D. Thoreau introduced us to years ago. Octave Thanet favors us with another bit of Arkansas description, this time of town life. She is proving herself an ardent defender of this much abused section. "The 'Quest of a Cup' is a pretty picture of walks in London. "Europe and Cathay" by John Fiske is, of course, interesting and valuable as is everything from his pen. "Courts of Conciliation" is a good chapter in jurisprudence, a study of life in Norway and Denmark. Prof. Woodrow Wilson contributes an article on "The Author Himself," and a good lesson he reads to those who would become instructors through authorship. "A Modern Mystic" is a setting forth of the life of Laurence Oliphant. No American monthly has departed less from the standard, set up at the beginning than has the Atlantic. It sticks to its old moorings. It has had different editors, but the style and quality remain the same.

The Cottage Hearth, published by the Cottage Hearth Co., Boston.

The first article is on the "Willey Slide" giving a graphic account of the hurrying away of the family in the cold and storm, and after all finding death while the home they left escaped. Hope Harvey has one of her characteristic talks with the girls. These talks are a feature of the magazine and we hope they will continue. The letter box is full, there is an article on "Happy Marriages" and several short stories, besides minor papers on various subjects. All good, and the price only $1.50 per year.

Scientific American.

One of the most interesting articles of the August numbers describes the earliest patent and some that followed closely after it. The earliest is dated March 11, 1617, and was granted by King James to Aron Rathborne. He was given the exclusive right of making "mappes" of London and other cities in England. The article that will doubtless attract the most attention is the description of the machinery of the Teutonic. Just now when the ocean steamers are breaking the records of quick Atlantic voyages, any thing regarding these steamships is of interest. Snakes come in for more than their share of notice, for there have been three illustrated articles on the varieties of serpents.

The Notes and Queries are, as usual, full of concise information on all the subjects of science.

"Whom Do Men Say that I Am?"

BY T. C. RICE.

CHAPTER VIII.

Spirits of the buried dead,
Howling round this life's head,
Felt like zephyrs on my cheek,
Hear in whisperings to speak,
Stealing on my waiting sight,
Hales of a sainted light,
Promise of a life to come,
Sought from cradle to the tomb,
Sought in vain through every plan,
From Buddha to the Vatican,
Figured in the kingly ghost,
Shadowed at the Pentecost,
Heard in every heard of tongue,
By clans and races said and sung,
In every clime and every age,
By prattling child and sapient sage,
Scolded, as bidding eat and drink,
The risen Christ from six-hundred withdrew.

I who laughed the church to scorn,
I who spurned the Bethlehem born,
I who held that soulless cause,
The Alpha and Omega was,
That body could a mind erect,
That faculties were but effect,
That matter was the all in all,
And spirit but a seneschal,
That all which is of needs must be,
That law is hers, a property,
To this my hope, "Soul does not die"
My mortal senses testify.

I whose saddened, qu'ning soul,
In nature saw its own control,
I who saw in mass or sphere,
The finger of no moulder near,
Who saw from profetoric birth,
By stages, ripeness issue forth,
So firmly fixed in the must be,
In swerveless, blind necessity,
Saw naught above the man or brute,
While grasping for the absolute,
See now in the antebirth state,
Where causes run to ultimates;
See as I downward trend through all,
From culmen to primordial,
See every page and every line,
Is indexed by a hand divine,
And pay debt in homage fit,
By bowing to the Infinite.

Thou Part! Thou Fountain of a whole!
Sum of an all pervading soul!
Thou Multi-unit, source of will,
To which mine act is answerable!
I, a part and parcel too,
Through my manhood conjure you,
Be unto my steps a light!
Guide me in the path of right!
Move my spirit to requite,
Ill with good, and wrong with right,
Be unto my fellow man,
All an unbound spirit can!
Sooth his sorrows, lift his care,
Make his burdens light and fair,
Whether in the path he go,
Of Christ, or Booth, or Manito!

CHAPTER IX.

I hate the Buddhists ancient creed,
I hate the sacraments and bread,
And on mine ear the zealots plea,
To Christ is utter blasphemy.
I hate the cant, I hate the prayer,
I hate the Christian everywhere,
I hate the pagan's god of stone,
The stupid votaries to the sun;
I hate the faithless every one;
And cast my rancor in the face,
Of all the unbellying rare.

Though mumbling Glosours chant or pray,
In goblet nave, or open bay,
Again shall Islam have her day,
When ruined shrine and smoking mosque,
Polluted moids and stained kiosque,
That crowd the vista of the years
So full of rapine, blood and tears.

Like angry ghonls shall rule the war,
And eke the Moslem's sinist'ar,
Y-et meet I would, Oh, Prophet true!
The Alkoran might the cross subdue,
So Allah would the faithful pray,
May intelds be taught the way,
The only way by which to come,
To Islam's sweet Elysium.
I, steadfast in the Moslem faith,
Must hold in life, will cleave in death,
'There is no God—God—and he our head,
His chosen Prophet, Mohammed."

CHAPTER X.

They tell me of a risen Christ,
A Vishnu, and all potent Booth,
Strange visions on my fancy loit,
Strange doctrines of belief intrude,
One hopes to win, on fields of strife,
His passport to eternal life,
While one, to taste redemption earned,
Must give his body to be burned.
One's zeal, with fire and blood would claim
The earth, to lift a prophet's fame.
By torture, deed, by prayer and grace,
They fit them for the heavenly race.

They mind me of a Northern Thor,
They bid me pay to fire devour,
They worship say, they worship Sun,
Say one is three, and three is one,
And when the devious course is run,
The last ends where the first begun.
So faiths and heed in circles run,
Maezlin in his call to prayer,
Azte, to his god of air,
Pagan, Christian, Brahmin, Booth,
And pious Shald with zeal imbued,
Blest with boon or curse with rod,
Fay homage to an unknown god;
While thus I balance fact and creed,
And running thus, the riddle read.

Matter, so with soul allied,
That they perish side by side,
Matter, mother of the soul,
Perfect, all sufficient whole,
Matter, check thy creatures pride,
Be my monitor and guide!
Let no vain, presumptuous "me"
Claim value mid Infanity.
Break these galling, rusting bands,
Forged of old by priestly hands,
Know I not no, "I" can hold
Aught but perishable mold?
Understanding, teach thyself, God,
Redeemer, Booth nor elf,
Sacred though the names may be,
Cancel mine obliquity.

Helpless came I from the womb,
Helpless shall be in the tomb,
But between them lies a space,
Where I must a record trace,
Acting wrong, or acting right,
Nature will the deed requite.
Evil comes for evil done,
Consequences must atone,
Shift or shuffle as I will,
Ends must follow causes still.
Turn whichever way I may,
The self declaring fact will say,
Mind can see in every plan,
Of moral guidance framed for man,
From India to the Occident,
Nature's code's equivalent,
In myth and ism, rank and name,
With all a devotee can claim,
In every attribute and grace,
The finger of the finite trace.
Matter! Thou thyself west first,
Matter! Thou shalt be the last.
By whatever name we call,
Matter! Thou art all in all.
Therefore call I thee the god,
Pouring blessings, wielding rod,
Say of my soul, "Thou canst but be
The gold of nature's alchemy."

What if it be, conditions rare,
Spirits wake from earth or air?
Its protoplast will find its goal,
Merged in the universal whole.
What if perchance the soul might wait,
Halting at dissolution's gate,
'Tis but the expiring flames delay,

The gins fatuus of decay,
Or if an all pervading mind,
An Omnipresent, undefined
Self, Universal, conscious night,
Evolves from out the infinite?
In each the reason but detects
Causes drifting to effects.

Drifting, drifting, hear that knell,
How its awful echoes swell,
Rolling over life's fair sea,
Down into eternity.
Drifting on death's dismal tide,
Loving with no hand to guide,
Drifting, sentient soul of me,
Drifting to nonentity.
Bark on a fair sea,
Swart to obscurity,
Souls in a phantom ship,
Taking the sun,
Just at the noontide dip,
Daylight is done,
On toward the breakers rolled,
Where will the anchors hold?
Tost through the gloomy gate,
Sport of a wanton fate,
Gone! Lost! Annihilate!
Chorus! Beadsman! Holy men!
Say your riddles o'er again.
(The End.)

Curious Corner.

Kings of Israel.

By S. Cruikshank—Author of Arthur Wyde's Discovery.

First, Saul is monarch by Divine behest
Ishbosheth next, then David, Israel's best;
Next Solomon, a reverential name,
As he, for wisdom, has the greatest fame,
Till in old age, he does the gift disgrace,
Which makes ten tribes revolt at his disgrace.
And these ten tribes to govern does begin,
Vile Jeroboam, who makes the nation sin.
He dying, Nadab, his ungodly son,
Succeeds him to his vices and his throne;
But hearen, with him, is righteously severe!
For Basha kills him, and becomes his heir.
Whose son, named Elah, in his stead does reign
Two years, and by conspiracy is slain.
Zimri, the slayer, ascends the throne in pride,
Reigns seven days and dies a suicide.
Tibni and Omri strive for princely sway,
At length the latter bears the palm away,
The man by whom Samaria since was built
Ascends the throne and gives new birth to guilt.
Ahab succeeds, and zealously does more
To foster crime than all who went before!
Weak Ahaziah next is sovereign lord—
By whom the God of Ekron is adored.
Jehoram next, for twelve full years did reign
With whom Elisha great repute did gain.
Then Joram, more unfortunate than all—
As in his life the pending curse must fall.
Next Jehu reigns—in vengeance to assail
The necks of all who bow the knee to Baal.
Jehoshaph and Joash, friends to vice,
Successive rule, and men to ill entice.
Proud Jeroboam the second, shows his face—
Then Zachariah—last of Jehu's race.
Hated Shallum, for a month succeeds;
Then Menasiah—a monster in his deeds!
Pekahiah reigns, whose sceptre, tootly won,
Descends to Pekah, Kamaliah's son;
Last Israel sees Hoshea at their head,
In whose vile reign they all are captive led.

An interesting Masonic Discovery.

The Rev. Mr. Haskett Smith, vicar of Brauncewell, in Lincolnshire, is said to have made a discovery of special interest to Freemasons. Mr. Smith has been sojourning for some months with the Druses of Lebanon, by whom he has been admitted into the most intimate relations, in consequence of the service rendered by him in sucking the venom of a deadly snake from the body of a popular young member of their tribe. Among other marks of favor, Mr. Smith was initiated into a number of mysterious rites, and among these according to the narrative we are quoting, his hosts startled him as a Freemason, by passing the most characteristic of masonic signs. Hence Mr. Smith argues that these strange people, who by some are believed to be lineal descendants of the ancient Hittites, are a branch of the great Phœnician race, whose ancestors supplied the Lebanon cedars to the builders of Solomon's temple.—London Daily News.

Indian Nomenclature.

Julian Ralph, in an article in Harper's Weekly, gives an interesting account of Father Lacombe, the apostle of the Blackfeet Indians who he says, is the most accomplished student of the Indian languages that Canada possess. "He told me," he says, "that the white man's handling of Indian words in the nomenclature of our cities, provinces, and States is as brutal as anything charged against the savages. Saskatchewan, for instance means nothing. Kiskiskatewau is the word that was intended. It means 'rapid current.' Manitoba is senseless, but 'Manitowapa' (the mysterious strait) would have been full of local import. However there is no need to saddle ourselves with this expert knowledge. Rather let us be grateful for every Indian name with which we have stamped individually upon the map of the world, be it rightly or wrongly set forth."

[From a private letter by George B. Churchill to home friends.]

LONDON, JULY 19, 53 WHARFEDALE.

The next day we went on up Wharfedale to Bolton Abbey. The ruins were beautiful and the scenery in which they are set more than beautiful. Description is impossible; an attempt at it would be only a multiplication of adjectives. Thence we took a twenty-seven mile ride across country, over the Yorkshire moors, to Fountain Abbey. This was one of the most enjoyable experiences of the trip, so far. The day was perfect—a very rare thing in England—the country lovely, as we went up the hills from Wharfedale. We could see for miles, and far off in the western horizon rose the mountains of Westmoreland—the "lake country." As we got "upper and upper" the scenery became wilder and wilder and finally we came on the moors; great waste stretches with only sheep and a few wild birds to be seen among living things, but these wild solitary moors have a wondrous color which is all their own and makes absence of life something almost to be desired. A lot of human beings would spoil the whole scene. For miles the only sign of human life was the grouse huts on the hill sides, scarcely to be distinguished from the dark green heath on which they stand. These moors are the famous shooting grounds of the Duke of Devonshire, and in these grouse huts the shooters stand and kill the birds as they are driven over them by the beaters.

Presently, having crossed the Moors, we came into a more smiling country, great upland fields of wheat, in every one of which the sky-larks were singing. Nearly every minute one would go up into the air, singing for dear life and mounting higher and higher as he circled round the field, and for nearly an hour I don't think there was a single minute without the song of these larks.

Fountain Abbey stands in the midst of the splendid grounds of the Marquis of Ripon. We saw it just about sunset, when the day and grounds were at their best, and had a most lovely walk of three miles through the sweet smelling English fields between hedgerows of wild roses and through a little village into Ripon where we passed the night. Thence we came down through the eastern cities which we visited almost solely for their cathedrals—York, Lincoln, Peterboro, Ely, Cambridge (for its University) and so to London. We made one or two side trips from our route, to Conesboro, to see the old castle which Scott writes about in "Ivanhoe," and to Huckle to see the grave of Byron. We were disappointed to find that Newstead Abbey, the former home of Byron, was closed on account of the recent death of Miss Webb, the daughter of the present owner.

We have now been in London four days, most of which time I have spent in what is called the "City," the oldest part of London. I have followed the steps of Washington Irving, described in his "London Antiquities," one of the sketches in his "Sketch Book," which I shall have to read with my class this next year. Of course London has changed somewhat since his day, some things that he describes are gone forever, but much yet remains, and besides visiting the places I have procured photographs as far as possible.

We are very comfortably fixed here at Woburn Place and I should like much to stay in London longer. But we must be getting on our way, and so tomorrow night (Monday, July 20) we shall leave London for Rotterdam and after two or three days in Holland go on up the Rhine."

TRIBUTE TO LOWELL.

In Memoriam.

From purest wells of English undefiled
None deeper drank than he, the New World's child.
Who, in the language of their farm-fields, spoke
The wit and wisdom of New England folk,
Shaming a monstrous wrong. The world-wide laugh
Provoked thereby might well have shaken half
The walls of slavery down ere yet the ball
And mine of battle overthrew them all.

—John Greenleaf Whittier.

ABOUT FOLKS.

Mr. Salmon Putnam of Holden, father of Messrs. Otis E. and Samuel H. Putnam met with a severe accident last Sunday, fracturing his thigh bone. Owing to his great age, he is in his 91st year, apprehensions are had that he may not recover.

"FRIDAY POPULARS."

Earl W. Bemis, Assistant City Engineer, Camden, N. J., and a graduate of the Polytechnic Institute, 1887, is enjoying a well earned vacation in this City.

Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Magee are the proud possessors of a handsome ten pound baby boy. Mr. Magee is the manager of the advertising department of the Telegram.

Mrs. David Scott and daughter, Alice, have returned from a very pleasant visit to Biddeford Pool, Maine, a beautiful place, almost an island on the coast. It is a wonder that more people do not find this choice spot. It is near Old Orchard Beach and big hotels are now contemplated.

Alderman Webster Thayer and family are home from Brant Rock.

Dr. G. A. Jourdan is home again from the shores of Maine.

Hugh Keon, Worcester's Americanized Chinaman, has gone to Wilbraham to still further perfect himself in his transformation.

Ex-Chief Combs of the Fire Department has had another relapse and is quite feeble.

The Worcester County Republican collapsed Feb. 6, 1839, and Major F. G. Stiles, then a boy, folded and directed the last issue, together with the late Edward R. Fiske. This paper began, March 4, 1839, on the accession of General Jackson to the presidency, was the one on which Ben. Perley Poore served his apprenticeship. In later years he was the best correspondent ever sent to Washington.

How a Reporter Won a Wife.

It is a Sketch From Journal Land.

The four o'clock edition of the afternoon paper was out, we were wiping the cares of the day from our minds in the city department, the editor was wiping the ink from his pen, and there was relaxation of every fiber in that big institution which for hours had been bending every muscle to its daily task. The joints of the press stopped squeaking for a few moments, and even the types, after standing on their feet all day, in ranks and rows and firm phalanx, each bearing on its shoulder its part of an idea; even these types were laid to rest for the night in the little dormitories that the printers call the "case."

The very telephone seemed taking its easy after hours of fretful, intermittent ringing—when, suddenly, the bell vibrated, a "bright young man" jumped to it, and after listening a bit turned to the managing editor with the remark:—

"Sensational suicide—elderly man, city official of some mediocre station, jumped off the bridge and leaves three fully orphaned daughters who are quite popular and cultured girls. Body was removed to the morgue. Lived at 7100 Grand City street."

At once the staff was all excitement. "Think it worth a special edition," says the editor-in-chief to the managing editor.

"Think it is," replied the M. E., and turning to the city editor asked, "What do you think?"

"Of course," almost shouted the C. E.

"And I've just got some good stuff about a revolt in Khirmasse, a remonstrance to Gladstone from South Hants and a challenge to Boulanger, besides a train wreck, 4 lives lost," supplemented the telegraph editor.

In two seconds I was running down-stairs and climbing into a cab to interview the family of the suicide. And I may say here, that I have had missions in journalism that I enjoyed, and some I did not; but it was neither the one nor the other here, for I simply shrank from the task. I have always felt I had a patent right to invade almost any place as a servant of the public, to search out facts to embellish with fancies. I have felt the encouragement that it was not I, but the representative of the people who subscribed for our paper, that went rambling about in the recesses of human nature; in the caverns of politics, in the back alleys and broad boulevards of topical lore and social event, for the food of current wisdom with which to feed the hungry multitude.

But a few times it has fallen to my lot to "break the news" of some disaster, some sudden tragedy, that I knew would break the heart of some one, most likely many more than one. It is a terrible task to enter unannounced! to invade and bring blight; to darken the door and, a great strong man, strike terror to the loving, trusting, shrinking, delicate soul of some woman, who has been bereaved for hours without having known it.

The pleasures of a year of journalism will not repay the pain of one hour spent in carrying news. And as the cab whirled me through the streets to this doomed bome, I felt terrors that Dante and Dore would have been incompetent to portray. Who or what kind of people I was to find, I had not the faintest idea. How to prepare them I could not surmise; and I had little superfluous time, for I must get "the story" for my paper, and get it right in the midst of that scene of woe and wailing; I must wrestle with the unwilling tongues of weeping women, must tell them the awful truth with so much tact as not to paralyze nor aggravate them.

As the carriage stopped before the number I had given the driver, I saw groups collected round about, at respectful distances, with their eyes all aimed at the house I was about to enter. Then I thought some one must have brought the news. Stepping into the millinery shop over which the house number was painted, I asked in low tones:—

"Does Mr. Milligan live here?"

"Yezzir, upstairs," was the reply. "Ruther he did, but I reckon he won't no more."

"Are any of his family at home?" I asked.

"Not yet. If they be I reckon they're upstairs—go 'round up the side way."

I went up, and as I did, my heart went down. But it seemed to vanish away entirely the next instant, as the door was opened by a girl of exquisite form and beautiful—simply beautiful face.

"Is this to be one of the sufferers?" I asked myself and then remarked to the same auditor, "I hope not; there are so many ugly women in the world, the meanness of whose nature deserves this affliction. Her face is too sweet; her manner too gentle, and her voice too silvery to be bent in mourning, to sorrow and sob."

"Have I the pleasure of meeting one of the Misses Milligan?" I inquired.

"I am Miss Constance Milligan," she answered.

"My name is Wm. Wilson," I responded, "and I beg a thousand pardons for intruding. I wish merely to make a few inquiries concerning your father."

"Ask the gentleman to come in," came from a pleasant voice in the room; for with its intonation I knew it to be the voice of one between girlhood and womanhood. Entering I saw her and a daughter of scarce eight years I judge—a trio, and all that melancholy Mr. Milligan left behind him that he cared for.

"As I took a seat the youngest came to me and I asked, 'Are you fond of your papa?'"

"Very much indeed," replied the next order. "They just think the world of one another. We all just worship papa, and he is as good to us as could be, but Mary is pa's particular favorite."

"Would you feel sorry if your pa was very sick?" I asked the little one, thus trying to prepare the elders.

Suddenly the eldest started from the seat and came over to me, just as I heard what I thought to be the wheels of the deputy-coroner's cart stop in front of the house. I had experienced pain before at the blunt way this official rushes in and notifies relatives of deceased people, in as few words as possible. So I nerved myself to give them a little shock before the great one should come.

"Mr. Wilson," she exclaimed, as she approached me, "I have had a foreboding all day that something terrible was to happen to father. You have some word of him that is bad, I know. Please tell me the worst at once and end this suspense."

All three of the girls had gathered and were hanging on my expected words, and clasping each other. It was a pretty group, and I could not inflict the fell wound that they asked. "Your father has been hurt," I replied.

"Badly?" they asked, clinging to each other and trembling.

"Very bad, indeed," I replied, listening with dread to the footsteps that came hurrying up the stairs. The oldest girl went to open the door, and I sprang up to intercept the harshness of the new visitor, if possible—but the second daughter grasped my sleeve with her frail yet forceful hand and with searching glance in my eyes demanded that I tell her the whole truth. But, the door opened, and instead of the coroner, came the reporter of a rival paper; and he saved me the trouble of telling.

"Mr. Milligan committed suicide this afternoon by jumping into the river," he cried. "Do you know any reason?"

The girl did not. For hours she knew nothing. As she fell, his whole manner seemed to change, and he sprang forward and caught her in his arms, as gently as a cavalier, and bore her, limp and seeming lifeless, to a sofa, where he laid her down as tenderly as a child.

"You brute," I exclaimed as he told his tale. "Have you no sense nor feeling? Suppose they were your own sisters." "I'm sorry," he said, with truly humble and contrite manner. "But who'd ever thought such magnificent creatures as these could have belonged to such a whiskey soaking ward politician. I've helped him out of the gutter many a time. Why, these girls are princesses. He often told me about his three girls, but I never thought they could be as well taken care of, as cultured as these seem."

The smallest one had fallen into a fit of violent weeping and the second who had swooned was reviving. "I'll go for a doctor," said I, and I did, leaving him to watch the pretty but stricken group. When I returned he said—"I knew all the particulars before, and have jotted them down. You know its against my principles to cooperate with reporters but these folks can't be left here with no one to look after them. They haven't a relative on earth. I think this case is an exception, so if you'll get this story to one of our reporters you can have it yourself, and I'll stay. You might come back after the paper goes to press and maybe you can do something."

Down to the reporter's room at the Four Courts I went, and hastily telling one of his colleagues the story, I also wrote and sent it to my paper. After the edition had emerged I went back to the scene of suffering. My fellow-reporter had established himself as an emergency brother, so to speak, Miss Constance had recovered to find him in the most devoted attendance to her. After it was all over, we both did all we could to assist the bereaved ones—particularly Miss Constance. Some way, though, I never could bring myself to such intimacy with her as he enjoyed—nor can I yet, for, after six months of pretty eager courtship, bestowed by both of us, that blunt reporter was married to her—and, after all my pains, I was left out in the cold.

"He was so good to me," she said, as I ground down the bitterness of my chagrin and congratulated them. "The first face I saw after that fearful blow was his," she went on. "He just took as good care of us as if he had been a brother. He never left us for a moment. And now he never is going to leave me—are you dear?" she asked turning to him.

"Ah, my boy, I cooked the feast and you are eating," I thought within myself. "Not a word of praise do I get for doing your duty and my own at the critical moment."

"Kate," said Constance to her next sister "is a pity you haven't some one to take as good care of you—"

"Thank you, I don't want any one," she interrupted, in maidenly brusque manner. Just then the tiny eight-year old came over and asked: "Why can't Mr. Wilson marry Kate and—"

The rest was drowned by laughter as Kate rose and, throwing down her book, gave vent to her embarrassment with the remark:—

"I want you to understand I'm not going to marry nobody—so there," and left the room just as the groom elated said:—"There was method in that grammar. Two negatives equal a positive, and left her a loop-hole for retrenchment."

But none has come, for I have always felt fully capable of selecting my future wife. Kate and I have been very good friends, though, and were she not preparing to wed a handsome and wealthy mining broker I might think certain things possible. But as it is, I am left all around, and the only relief I get as I carry this sad and lonely bachelor's heart with me, is when that lovely "eight-year old" girl climbs up and puts her little arms around my neck and says:—"Never mind; just wait a little while 'till I grow up and you shan't be lonesome any longer. I'll marry you and show them how much they missed it."

And while I wait for the winds of volunteer affection to waft my bark out upon the sea of matrimony, I am allowed to lie at anchor in the kindly harbor of their united friendship.—Spectator.

Both gentlemen are thoroughly conversant with their business, and their local acquaintance should guarantee them success in their new venture.

"Sappho."

Sweet bird of song, through all the ages vast,
 Like a bright star beyond our reach on high,
 Thy lustre never dimmed, but, as time speeds along,
 More radiant shines thy glory in the sky.
 Nor wrong, nor ignorance can mar thy history's page,
 Like the bright lucent skies which arch fair Hellas'
 shore,
 A stranger, wandering 'mongst thy storied isles
 Feels thy weird presence sweep his being o'er.
 Ages ago, in thy sweet happy home of peace,
 Where love shone forth with bright redoubt rays,
 Thou radiant queen, amid the lesser stars that shone,
 Taught Purity and sang through all the sunny days;
 And far across the sea, in distant foreign lands, Fair "daughter of the Gods" thy lyre's soft dulcet strains,
 Touched hearts attuned to sweetest melody,
 And swept away full many cares and pains.

Where hast thou gone? fair priestess of the long ago,
 Must we turn upward to the star decked dome?
 Has some fair sister now thy presence bright?
 In distant Orion hast thou found a home;
 Or 'midst the Pleiades dost thy fair gentle hand, Guide the twin sisters through the azure realms of space?

We ask, we children of another race and clime,
 Where have ye hid your bright and smiling face?

Down through the dim-arched vistas of the past,
 There floats sweet music of the long ago,
 Beneath the ocean waves, on the soft midnight air,
 Come rhythmic strains of which we mortals little know.
 But through the wondrous peace that fills our souls,
 We catch a gleam of Sappho's radiant face, once more,
 Fair sister, welcome, welcome three times three,
 Back to the homes, and hearts, and earth of yore.
 —Fred L. Hildreth.

Discontentment is the Story.

Eternal nature leads the way,

My circling path lies through the wood,
 Where scarce the sunbeams cast a ray,
 And heat of day is there withstood.

Lost to the gazing world and throng,
 I while a time in haunts like these,
 Nor sigh for what the most may long
 A mind content and well at ease.

Beyond me lies the hill-side town
 At rest in its summer glory,
 And there men fret in their renown
 Discontentment is the story!

Herr Cherrytree.

Some Sentiments.

I notice that when a very prominent man in this country "shuffles off the mortal coil" and rests with his fathers, some individual or paper *propose*s that a monument be erected to his memory. The monument rarely appears. The proposing finally ends in nothing and if the monument comes, it comes though the efforts of another generation.—Waltham Chat.

The death of James Russell Lowell creates a void in American literature that cannot be filled, and involves the loss of the purest men that ever honored the title of American Citizen.—Athol Transcript.

Why not ask for a little legislation that will prevent the drunkenness and gambling at college athletic contests that have ruined hundreds of young men, and should make many college presidents and professors ashamed to encourage "sports" that tend to so much demoralization and disgrace?—Windham County Transcript.

Loie M. Royce, the Nebraska school teacher who became a heroine in the great blizzard of March 12, 1888, has become the bride of a Michigan newspaper man.

Old carpets may be made into rugs by unravelling them and weaving the ravellings on frames which come for this purpose, or knitting them.

Yellow spots on the linen or cotton produced by the iron may be removed by setting them in the broiling sun.

Salad is much easier served and much more appetizing when placed on individual plates.

The soap-saver is a useful little utensil. It is a box of wire net with a long handle attached. The soap is placed in it, and if shaken in pan of dishwater, will produce a strong suds without the slightest waste.

If the hands are rubbed on a stick of celery after peeling onions the smell will be entirely removed.

A very good authority gives as a very simple remedy for hicough:—a lump of sugar saturated with vinegar. In ten cases, tried as an experiment, it stopped hicough in nine.

Inflammation of the bowels. Of course the safe way is to send for the doctor without delay. But in the country, one is often obliged to wait a long time. Anxiety makes the time seem long anywhere, and simple remedies are often very efficient helps. So, while you are waiting make a paste of lard and salt, fold a wide pillow-case (as that is always at hand) into a large square, spread on the paste and lay the cloth smoothly, paste side down, over the bowels, stomach, sides, and as far toward the back as you can. When the inflammation is severe, the lard will be absorbed in a very short time. Be prepared to change the paste as often as needed. Never mind wasting the salt. There is no particular rule, only be sure to stir enough. All that is not needed will remain on the cloth.

One always has this remedy in the house. So it can be made ready in a moment, and the quicker the better is the order in a such cases. I have used it where the patient was in perfect agony of suffering, and the doctor far away. The result was always more than satisfactory, there being a very perceptible decrease of pain in a wonderfully short time. Of course the doctor smiled knowingly when I told him, but then I was quite willing he should smile, for the patient was comfortably sleeping when he arrived.

In another case all remedies failed, and it was said the patient must die—but she didn't.

Many steps may be saved if the housewife will have a market basket in which to carry things back and forth from table to pantry and cellar. The basket may be decorated much or little as the taste dictates. I much prefer a large basket, staired on the outside and lined with oil-cloth, as it is easier to keep clean. The basket is handier than a server since it can be carried in one hand.

Instead of sewing a patch on a table-cloth, patch the piece on with starch, and then smooth it with a hot iron.

Have you any idea of what is possible in the line of lamps & beauty, price.

The collection we have just completed we believe has never been equaled in these two important points. A most wonderful exhibit of American ingenuity, enterprise and artistic ability in lamp manufacture.

New processes, new materials, new results.

It you want light

and plenty of it, cleanliness, freedom from odor and absolute safety, you can have it.

The genuine "Rochester" and the newer "B and H", have, as all good things do have, countless imitators, cheaper, very likely, inferior, most surely, and wholly dependent upon their extensive advertising for even a limited sale. There are no lamps to be compared with the "Rochester" and "B and H." central draft, for quality or power of light.

Their sale is as wide as the world. They go to every country. We don't "control" them. Any reputable dealer will sell you one. We simply offer a larger selection than others, the full line in fact of both makes and give you the price advantage that comes from large buyings.

Dainty colorings

in parlor lamps, beautiful hand painted vase lamps with bisque finish and silver trimmings, table lamps of Royal Copper, Ormolu, gold and silver finish, and all possible combinations of porcelain and metals.

Mexican onyx

is largely used in Piano Lamps, and is much less expensive than in years past. The opening of new mines has made it possible to sell a fine lamp for less than the former price of the table alone.

We call it good.

A full silver plated "Rochester" piano lamp complete with large umbrella shade, and patent extension $10.

And so we say whatever is good in the lamp business, we have it. Whatever is the newest you will surely find in our tables. The lowest price you will hear quoted will be our price, lastly, whenever and wherever you buy a central draft lamp, insist upon having the Rochester or B and H, they and they only are sure to be right in every way.

About Folks.

Many people had thought Lawyer James H. Bancroft a hopeless case of bachelorhood, but the unexpected always happens and just now, his many friends in the Burnside block and elsewhere are tendering congratulations over his marriage last Saturday to Miss Abbie L. Wheeler of Gardner, formerly of Ashby, at the residence of Deacon S. N. Lewis, in Gardner, by Rev. Robert F. Tolman. They will reside at 5 Cottage street, for many years the home of Mr. Bancroft.

On the afternoon of September first a birthday party was held for Robert and Hazel Adams at number 8 Dix street. Seventeen little people gathered at three o'clock for games and a general good time. Then there were cake and ice cream and "The biggest plate of biscuit I ever saw" — one little boy reported. At six o'clock, each one was given a souvenir, in the way of a covered basket filled with candy. Each basket was lined with fringed tissue paper of different colors. Here are the names of those who attended: Hattie Adams, Bessie Atherton, Ruth Atherton, Alice Casey, Maria Pierce, Flossie Greene, Ruth Smith, Clara Laurence, Phillip Atherton, Carl Atherton, Warren Casey, Floyd Short, Robert Caswell, Roy Tillinghast, Russell Hamilton, Delos Roe, Harriet Roe. Two of those invited could not come, but perhaps they had a slice of the birthday cake to make up for the loss of so much fun. We will hope so.

Dr. and Mrs. J. P. Rand started Thursday on a two-weeks' pleasure trip in the form of a carriage drive through the hills of New Hampshire. It is hoped that the outing will prove beneficial to Mrs. Rand, who has for some time been in failing health.

Among the illustrations which accompany the last paper of Capt. Daniel Morgan Taylor's article on "The Massachusetts Volunteer Militia" in the September Outing are a portrait of privates, Battery B., Light Artillery, M. V. M., to show the uniform and a portrait of Col. Ebury P. Clark, of the second Regiment, of which the Light Infantry and City Guards of this city are members.

Fred L. Emory who had the advantages of the W. H. S. and the Polytechnic, Class of '87, has been honored with a call to the directorship of the Manual Training School of West Virginia, Morgantown. This call comes from the Regents of the State University and his friends are not a little pleased thereat.

Telescopes.

Nearly all of the recent telescopes are refractors; i.e., the observer looks directly at the star. The largest one is at Lick Observatory on Mt. Hamilton, Cal.

The object glass is 36 inches in diameter, and was ground by Alvan Clark of Cambridge, Mass. This firm also made a glass lately for the observatory at Pultowa, Russia. Its diameter is 30 inches and the one at Nice is of the same diameter.

The largest reflector is the Lord Rosse in Ireland 6 feet in diameter, and with a focal length of 53 feet.

Good to Eat.

Luncheon Short Cake.

Make a nice short cake, after it is baked, split it open and spread with butter; then a thick layer of good ripe peaches sliced finely; then sprinkle plenty of sugar over the peaches, cream and crust may be added. This way of preparing short cake is considered more digestible, if placed on ice to cool.

Peaches may be pared in a neat and expeditious way by placing them in a wire basket and dipping them for a moment in boiling water then transfer them quickly into a pail of cold water and pare at once. The peaches should be ripe, and firm.

Royal Pears.

Take pears not quite ripe, pare and core them and cut in thin quarters. To eight pounds of pears add five pounds of sugar, the rind of three lemons cut into strips. To the juice of the lemons, add one pint of water and two tablespoonfuls of ginger: boil all together until the fruit is transparent, then put into glass cans.

Egg Lemonade.

Squeeze and strain one half lemon in a glass of water then add one egg well beaten. It is delicious.

Oyster Omelette.

Beat four eggs very light. Cut the hard part out of eight or a dozen oysters, according to their size, wipe them dry, and cut them up in small pieces, stir them into the beaten egg and fry them in hot butter. When the under side is brown, sprinkle a little salt and pepper over the top, and fold one half over the other.

Truffed Chicken.

Boil until tender a nice plump chicken. When cold, remove all the white meat, and cut it into dice. Put one tablespoonful of butter in a small saucepan. When melted, add one tablespoonful of flour, mix until smooth; add a half-pint of milk, stir continually until it boils, add the chicken, a half teaspoonful of salt, a dash of white pepper. When hot, add the yolks of two eggs, a cup of finely chopped mushrooms and four truffites cut into tiny pieces. Cook one minute, and serve in the small cups.—Boston Budget.

Time for Cooking Winter Vegetables.

Squash, one hour. White potatoes, half an hour. Baked potatoes, one hour. Sweet potatoes, three-fourths of an hour. Baked sweet potatoes, one hour. Turnips, two hours. Beets, three hours and a half. Parsnips, one hour. Carrots, one hour and a half. Cabbage, three hours.

A delicate way to serve salt cod is to bake it with potatoes, eggs and milk. Soak one pound of the fish in cold water over night; in the morning, drain, cover with boiling water and let it stand on the back of the stove where it will not boil for half an hour. Drain and press out all the water and pick it to pieces carefully, rejecting all the skin and bones. In the meantime, boil and mash six good-sized potatoes, add two tablespoonfuls of butter, the fish, a quarter of teaspoonful of black pepper, four beaten eggs and a pint of rich new milk. Mix well, pour into a buttered baking-dish and put in a hot oven to brown.

Plum Roll

BY MRS. S. T. RORER,

Principal Philadelphia Cooking School.

Add one teaspoonful of Cleveland's baking powder and a half teaspoonful of salt to one pint of sifted flour. Sift again. Rub in one tablespoonful of butter, add sufficient milk to make a soft dough. Roll out, sprinkle with one cup of chopped raisins and a half cup of chopped citron. Dust with cinnamon, roll up and steam for thirty minutes. Serve warm with hard sauce.

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

The most healthful leaven is carbonic acid gas from pure cream of tartar and soda. It is the only leavening power of Cleveland's Baking Powder. That is why Cleveland's is perfectly wholesome, leavens most and leavens best. Try it, Cleveland's.

Daniel Seagrave, Printer.

On this day, September 5th, Mr. Seagrave is just sixty years old, for it was in 1831, in the town of Uxbridge that he started the career that now finds him a worthy citizen of our Worcester. He is of farmer lineage, the very best possible, being the son of Daniel and Mary (Weld) Seagrave whose lives were spent in that goodly town, so near the southern line of our county. The paternal ancestry runs through Daniel, John, Edward, and John who was an Englishman and undertook to come with his family to America but died at sea, and was buried in the Atlantic. The great grandfather, Edward, was a small boy when, with three other children, his mother landed in Boston. He, finally, settled in Uxbridge, was a minute man and a captain during the Revolutionary war.

The mother, Mary Weld, was born in Charlton, though descended from the famous Boston family of that name. Her father was a soldier in the war of 1812 and his musket, cartridge box with some unused cartridges and his plume are now in the possession of his grandson.

Our subject had the benefit of the town schools, including the Academy which preceded the High School, including among his teachers Dr. Macomber, who in his earlier days was accounted a famous instructor.

The old Seagrave homestead, built before 1790 is still standing, and some of the original acres are yet in the hands of members of the family. Would that more of the old families had clung to the soil and that our new comers had, instead, gone to the untilled West.

Mr. Seagrave came to Worcester in the Spring of 1849 and like so many other printers found service on the Spy. James L. Estey stood by his side his first day as he set his first stick full of type which went into the Spy the next morning. This was in the days of John Milton Earle and here he remained as apprentice, journeyman and foreman till 1861. Then, with his cousin, Albert Tyler, he bought out the Spy job office and in the old Transcript and Spy buildings for twenty-one years, as Tyler & Seagrave, the firm continued, using, in places, material that had come down from the days of Isaiah Thomas. In fact in 1876, they set up, in old Spy sticks, a fac simile of the Spy of 1776, which was stereotyped during that centennial year. The old Press and much valuable antiquarian matter was, in 1876, presented to the American Antiquarian Society and set up for inspection. They may be found in the first room at the left as we enter the hall, having been set up there by Mr. Seagrave. After Mr. Tyler went out of the business in 1882, Mr. S. continued the work alone till 1888, in the early Fall. He has ever had a liking for the antique and he was one of the founders of the Worcester Society of Antiquity, of which he is a life member; was present at the second meeting and would have been at the first, had not another engagement prevented. For six and a half years, he was the painstaking secretary and, for a long time, he was on the committee on nominations. In this line of the ancient, he has compiled a Genealogy of the Seagrave Family which is a standard work, and for more than a quarter of a century he has been the historiographer of the First Universalist Church.

He early joined the Masonic Order and much of his time and zeal have been given to the study of Masonic matters. He was made a Master Mason in Morning Star Lodge, June 9, 1857, and, soon after, was Secretary pro tem. In 1858, he was a charter member of Montacute Lodge; was its first Tyler and till 1867, was in charge of all the Masonic rooms except those of Morning Star; of Montacute Lodge, he has been Treasurer and Chaplain. In 1850, he became a member of Worcester Royal Arch Chapter and has held nearly every office in it, having been High Priest two years and is now Secretary, for the second year. In 1863, he entered Hiram Council, Royal and Select Masters, the largest in the world num-the Lodge of Perfection, he has been Treasurer, etc., and in Rose Croix, he was second officer for some time. He is a life member of Montacute Lodge and an Honorary member of Worcester Chapter, and he has been in the Massachusetts Consistory. In 1867, and the following three years he conferred degrees of the Masonic Fraternity of Eastern Star on eighty members, and in 1871 organized and named Stella Chapter, and for two and a half years was its presiding officer. In 1876, the Grand Chapter of the state was formed, he being President of the Convention, and for two and one half years, was the first Grand Patron of the state. In the following two years, in connection with the late Thomas M. Lamb he served on important committees on ritual and jurisprudence; was elected Secretary in May, 1881, an office which he still holds. While Grand Patron he gave three ad-resses, largely historical, which were printed in the Proceedings. He is librarian of the Masonic Library and for a number of years has been contributor to several Masonic publications.

In religious matters Mr. Seagrave is a Universalist, having begun attending that church in 1840. He united with the society in 1855 and joined the church in 1863. He was made a member of the Standing Committee and in 1864, became a deacon, a position held by him for twenty-five years; during the last ten years he was Treasurer and Almoner of the church fund. Resigning these offices he was made Clerk and, ever, has been the annalist. For thirty-two years he was Teacher, Secretary, Assistant Superintendent and Acting Superintendent of the Sunday School; his wife was a teacher in the school thirty years.

Mr. Seagrave has a pardonable pride in being a life member of the Worcester County Mechanics Association, having joined in 1852. He has served on the Board of Directors and has done no little work on the Library Committee.

He was married in 1853, Nov. 16, to Miss Delia Elizabeth Hurlbert of Northfield, Vt., though born in Littleton, N. H. Her parents were Capt. Thomas S. and Elizabeth (Brown) Hurlbert. Their home is at No. 8 Crown Street, where they have lived since 1854. Both Mr. and Mrs. S. are life members of Stella Chapter of the Eastern Star, which makes him a life member of the state organization, and by virtue of his being Grand Patron he holds a life membership in the national body.

being above eight hundred, and here he has been Recorder and Deputy Master several years and, two years was Thrice Illustrious Master. He is now Chaplain. Next January, Mr. S. will have completed twenty-five full years as representative from that body in the Board of Masonic Directors and then will have two more years to serve. When he retired from the chair, he gave an address on Hiram Council and Cryptic Masonry, for which he was thanked by the Council. The Commandery was entered in 1860 and of this he has been Sentinel and Armorer several years; was Recorder and Warden two years each and besides has held other offices. He has taken all the degrees of the Scottish Rite from the 4th to the 32d inclusive. In

Mr. Seagrave has never been active in politics though he has been inspector and warden in Ward 8 several years. Casting his first vote in 1852, he has never failed to vote since, always voting a Free Soil or Republican ticket, save once.

In conclusion, he is a man who merits and maintains the highest respect of a wide circle of friends.

REMINGTON STANDARD TYPE WRITER }
WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT, }
BOSTON, MASS., JULY 30, 1891. }

Mr. A. H. HINMAN, Worcester, Mass., Dear Sir:—

The demand for Remington Typewriter operators has become so great that we have been obliged to open in connection with our Boston office a department for securing and placing operators who use our machines. The result has been that through our Boston office alone during the past year from July to July we have placed 612 young men and women in good business positions. This does not include any placed by our thirty odd agents in New England. In no case, either from the person placed or from the employer have we received one cent for our services. So great has been the demand from business men that we have been almost constantly embarrassed in our efforts to find a sufficient number of young men and women qualified to fill positions. To be a candidate for our strictly gratuitous services to young men and women, we require that our operators shall be able to write shorthand at the rate of 90 words per minute and transcribe the matter upon the Remington Typewriter at 30 words per minute. As you in line with leading business colleges have decided to use our machines exclusively, we propose to LOOK TO YOUR COLLEGE FOR REMINGTON OPERATORS. We shall instruct our Boston, Worcester and New England Agents to do all we can in placing your graduates in business offices as you qualify them. Yours very truly,

WYCKOFF, SEAMANS & BENEDICT.

Hinman's College can qualify shorthand students for business and PLACE THEM IN POSITIONS IN HALF THE TIME AND FOR HALF THE MONEY required by the other shorthand school in Worcester, whose circulars say:—"We will in no case and under no circumstance agree to furnish a position for any pupil, we would rather not receive that pupil at all than to guarantee to furnish a position.

These energetic gentlemen have wrought quite a change in the premises so long occupied by Henry W. Miller. To begin with large single glass windows have taken the place of the smaller ones and instead of going down stairs, the large central stair-way, leads up. Beneath these stairs is the way down, a great economy of space. Then the office, so long used by Mr. Miller is changed about to advantage, but the gentle face of the long time proprietor, in crayon, is to look down upon his clerks and present successors.

Principal Bartlett who made the trip to Detroit as one of Commander Veazy's aids, after the encampment, went on West to South Bend, Ind., revisiting scenes, familiar to him twenty years ago. He is very enthusiastic in his admiration for the changes wrought in the interval, finding relatives surrounded by comfort and plenty, who then were almost in the wilderness. He returned leisurely, through Canada and Vermont to his farm in Huntington, Mass, whence he came back invigorated for the Chandler street campaign, about to begin.

The Demorest Prize Declamation contest, advertised in another column, is a most admirable scheme to keep alive an interest in temperance work. The selections to be proclaimed are temperance lectures in themselves and expressed by youthful voices they ought to make deep impressions. Seven towns, including Worcester, are represented by contestants and everything points to a most entertaining and profitable evening on Tuesday next, at Continental Hall.

Society of Antiquity.

The first meeting of the Fall was held Tuesday evening. President Crane in the chair, F. P. Rice was Secretary, Pro. Tem. Seven new members were elected and the opening of the new building was discussed. A committee consisting of Alfred S. Roe, Clark Jillson, Z. W. Coombs, Rev. A. E. P. Perkins and M. A. Maynard was appointed to take into consideration and to report a plan for dedication.

Mr. Richard Hill Hammond has returned from a trip to Chicago.

The story of DRESS GOODS goes on day after day.

The eye of a trained woolen man rests on them, and instantly he thinks of the Scottish chiefs in worsted making, and the classic river Tweed.

He touches them and doubts a bit, and questions—Scotch or English.

But they are neither. They are made by a nearby stream and the craftsmen are Yankees, the wool only came from beyond the sea.

Color, weave, pattern, style all perfect. They are from 40 to 54 inches, and cost from 75c to $1.75 a yard.

The 50c stuffs come in a hundred or more different styles and colorings. Designs as rich, perhaps, as you'll see in some of the costlier goods.

New Velvets to match any color. Two qualities now $1.00 and $1.50 a yard. 25 shades in each. More next week.

WORCESTER, MASS., APRIL 1, 1890.

THE ROYAL STEAM HEATER CO. Gentlemen:—Having purchased two of your Heaters, one now in use three years, the other 2 years, I can safely say we could hardly keep house without one. I would rather take care of our Heater with 13 radiators attached than one parlor stove where I had to bring coal and carry away the ashes. Anyone intending to heat by steam should examine the Royal and note the working of the Grate, which I think is far ahead of any I have ever seen. I will gladly give information to intending purchasers. Respectfully yours F. E. BARNARD. Barnard Bros., Trunk Manufacturers, 494 Main St. Branch Office, 39 Pearl Street, Worcester.

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a housekeeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility.

One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

That cheereth me,

—Horatius Bonar.

For our latitude, was there not a mistake in making the New Year begin January 1st?

It marks no era in the round of the year. The Vernal and the Autumnal Equinoxes; the Summer and the Winter Solstices are natural events that would mean something in a year's history, but of January 1st, all that can be said is that it is near Christmas.

After all does not our real year begin when the schools do? Here we have been running all over creation during the summer months. Everybody who could has gone to the ends of the earth. Business has been dull, at its very dullest, but the signal for school to begin brings the remotest, home; clerks resume their places behind the counter; the whirl of Commerce is again heard and it looks as though the year had begun.

"This year" is an expression of very diverse application. It may mean the Year of Grace 1891. It may mean the School year which began Tuesday, it may mean a Town year which begins in February or March, or when we speak of the License year, we mean that commencing the first of last May. The meaning of many a word depends upon its application.

In the school year, now in progress, many and diverse parts must be acted. The parent has not done all in turning the child over to the teacher's care for a few hours daily. There is or should be a home influence to follow and assist the instructor's efforts to lead and direct the pupil. It may be granted that many homes are such in name only; but irresponsible pupils do not always come from such places. The out-of-school atmosphere is very soon apparent in the school life.

That parent must be blind or stupid to send a child to school to get rid of him and, when many others do the same, then wonder that the teacher does not get along better with forty urchins than the parent does with his one or two. There are just such people, however, even in our steady going Worcester.

No sadder comment was ever made on the defects of some home lives than in the reported words of the mother of a boy, recently killed upon a railroad in this city. If the paper reported her correctly, when called upon, at the time of the accident, she said that she did not know where he was, that he had left home in the morning to amuse himself during the day, according to his custom.

No wonder Topsy said, "I grewed, just like any other Nigger." We have Topsy's of both sexes and of all nationalities. They are not reared nor trained. They grow up or merely vegetate. The wonder is that more are not killed or do not die of neglect. The survival of the fittest or the strongest is the only rule by which their existence is explainable. These same parents would think very hard thoughts of the teacher who did not know where his pupils were. Is it one of the chief failings of humanity to shift all burdens and responsibilities off upon other shoulders?

The recent spanking of a juvenile delinquent is an instance in point. The law forbids the arrest of children under twelve. What is a man to do when his fruit and flowers are picked by such lawless fellows? They patrol the streets in search of places that suit them and when caught in the act accuse the owners. If the latter administer proper punishment, they are arrested for assault. Luckily, our judge discharged the defendant.

John May

Taking the law into one's own hand is risky business; for as the policeman said, "Much depends upon the judge." A man's pear trees are completely skinned and he secures the taking to court of the fourteen years old thief, but nothing comes of it. He is not held. If teachers can impress upon their pupils correct notions of lawful and safe possession they will accomplish a much more important task than to have taught them all about Africa and Oceania.

Downright unswerving honesty along with a love for country that would prompt to any sacrifice are as important as any lesson that the teacher can impart. If for any reason the teacher is unequal to the task of inculcating such principles, then he is, clearly, unworthy of his place. Again these principles are of more consequence here in America than in any other land, for we have vastly more and divergent people to assimilate. Our task is one to try all our powers and resources.

By all means, show the good points of a city or town. Prove to the world to be investor that he will have good company and that the advantages of the location, as to transportation and help, are second to none, but don't tax the poor to make the rich, richer. No ultimate good comes to any place that resorts to such processes. Business is not a form of tramping. It is the result of growth and, naturally, partakes of the nature of its surroundings. Those towns that are crying themselves hoarse to secure new enterprises may yet regret this fervor.

Charles Dudley Warner.

Whenever LIGHT's publication day coincides with the birthday of a noted American, it is a pleasure to present his portrait to our readers. September 12th is the anniversary of the birth of Charles Dudley Warner, a writer who has given a deal of pleasure to a wide circle of people. He is a native of Plainfield, Mass., 1829, and we conclude that his most delightful book "Being a Boy" details some of the scenes of his own youth. He was prepared for college in Cazenovia, N. Y., and was graduated at Hamilton College Clinton, N. Y., in 1851. He won the first prize in English and he has been winning prizes right along since. In 1856 he was graduated from the Law Department of the University of Pennsylvania, but like Lowell, he preferred Letters and coming east he became connected with the Press in Hartford and then with the Courant where he is today. He is a near neighbor and friend of Mark Twain and of Mrs. Stowe. As the manager of the Editor's Drawer in Harpers he has a following of readers over the whole English speaking world. The book that gave him his introduction into America was "My Summer in a Garden." People read, laughed and blessed the writer. Since its publication, 1870, he has put forth many volumes; but no one has eclipsed in interest the one just named. He has delivered many addresses on all sorts of occasions and has been a voluminous writer for the magazines. He has brought smiles to many faces and that is the best that can be said of any man. In Hartford, he shares the literary renown of that beautiful city with Twain and Mrs. Stowe. No one, there, fails to tell you that this is the home of Charles Dudley Warner, and well they may be proud of him. His very latest book is a volume of excerpts from the Editor's Drawer. Of the most of his books, Houghton, Mifflin & Co. of Boston are the publishers.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY SEPT. 12, 1891.

The printing of the Index, last week, crowded out the Record of the Week, already overdue. Pains will be taken to avoid such faults in the future.

St. John's Echo for September comes out under the editorial management of John M. Kendall and he has done his work well. This paper is trying the experiment of living without advertisements. It will need much patriotic support on the part of the people; but those of this parish will give it if any will and Mr. Kendall furnishes them a paper worthy of their encouragement.

The Athol Transcript of this week is a great number. Its first page is given to a remarkable panoramic representation of the late carnival. More than fifty views of the procession are given, showing it at different points. Both views and printing are excellent. The description of the scene is also good, making Tuesday's paper one to be desired by any one who knows ought of Athol. Both the town and the Transcript are to be congratulated.

It appears that LIGHT's information as to the proximity to the Sterling Camp ground of the school house of "Mary had a little lamb" fame was incorrect. The house was in this town, but in another portion thereof. It was known as the old red school house, and was supplanted by a new one years ago.

Andrew Athy.

There is much in a name. A well balanced cognomen, something out of the regular every day order, is worth money to the business man and reputation to the aspirant for fame. It is said that the name, Orange Judd was so peculiar, yet so attractive that many people supposed it an assumed one, and when, one day, it was found printed all over one of the pages of the New York Herald, thousands of readers were led to send for the American Agriculturist just to find out who and what Orange Judd was. All this as prefatory to a brief sketch of the gentleman who, this year, heads the Democratic column in our annual political fight. Had the Athy parents searched the records through they could not have found a more rhythmical first name for their son. "Pronounce the two together" and could a better combination be devised? To be sure, intimate friends may drop the latter appellation and familiarly call our Ex-Alderman by his good old Bible name; but to the most of Worcester's citizens he is first, last and always "Andrew Athy."

He was born in County Galway, away over on the Atlantic washed side of Ireland, January 1, 1832. Neither he nor his friends have any difficulty in remembering that birthday. His new year, and good resolutions and the Christian Year all begin at the same time. He was just sixteen years old when he came to New York and began a new life on these Western Shores. Soon after landing he made his way to Boston and began the hard work to which he has been no stranger from that day to this. He had such educational advantages in America as evening schools afforded, of course only a breath compared to what the mass of our people enjoy today. He sought Worcester in 1850 and began to work in boot shops. For several years he was an employe of Joseph H. Walker, a considerable portion of the time as foreman. In 1875, he began the undertaking business at the stand still maintained on Green Street.

Mr. Athy was elected to the Common Council in 1865 and with the exception of 1868, he was in that body constantly for thirteen years. In 1874 and '75 he represented his district in the State Legislature and from 1881, inclusive, he was an alderman from Ward V. Among his Worcester colleagues in '74 were the Hon. Samuel Winslow and James E. Estabrook. In '75 along with him, there went down on Worcester, the Hon. W. W. Rice, S. R. Heywood, James E. Estabrook, Enoch H. Towne and Osgood Bradley, Jr. Possibly, no man in Worcester, today, has had more experience in municipal affairs. In both the City Council and the Legislature, he served upon important committees and everywhere enjoyed the respect of his fellow law makers. In 1886, he was the Democratic candidate for the mayoralty against the Hon. Samuel Winslow when the latter was up for his first reelection. From the close of that year, to his election to the chairmanship he has had a political rest, the very first in a long term of years.

While Mr. Athy has always acted with the Democratic Party, there has never been an opportunity for him to show his sympathy with movements for the bettering of the laboring classes that he has not embraced. Away back, before the Know Nothing days, he was a member of the Jackson Guards an organization that Governor Gardner disbanded. He is one of the oldest and one of the most prominent members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and has held every office in that body. For a long time he has been connected with the Irish Catholic Benevolent Society and in the days of the Land League, he was president of the local association, besides being a delegate, several times, to the national convention, and on St. Patrick's day celebrations, he has repeatedly been the Grand Marshal.

His business and his political offices have given him a very wide acquaintance with citizens of Worcester. Very few men could go through Main street and find more people whom they knew than can our Democratic Ex-Alderman. In that particular portion of Worcester where he lives and where his business is, he is regarded as a sort of walking cyclopaedia of personal knowledge as the dwellers there-a-bouts. If there is one diversion that Mr. A. fancies above another, it is to run into a theatre and see as much of a play as he has time to witness. In this way, he has become a sort of dictionary of theatrical reminiscence, memories that are always entertaining.

Mr. Athy's only son, James A., is associated with him in business. Of his four daughters, the oldest is Mrs. John J. Horgan of Worcester, Frances was graduated at the High School in 1875 and at the Normal later. She is now a teacher in our public schools. Nettie, also, went through the High School and is a singer of high repute. The youngest daughter Annie was graduated in 1880 and after a thorough study of Dramatic Art is now a member of the Effic Ellsler troupe, playing Hazel Kirke.

A brother of our chairman, P. R. Athy was Chief of Police in Memphis during the terrible Yellow Fever Scourge of 1878 and stayed manfully at his post, though many of his force succumbed to the destroyer. Subsequently, he was elected Sheriff and died in 1882 just at the beginning of his second term.

Of course, the Democratic party has a long record in our city, much longer than that of the Republicans. In Mr. Athy's present position some of the most prominent men in the party have acted. Beginning with 1884, when the Democrats elected their first president since James Buchanan, their City organization has been as follows:

CHAIRMAN.	SECRETARY.
1884 J. E. Estabrook,	Richard Mathers,
1885 E. A. Harris,	Richard Matweys,
1886 E. A. Harris,	J. W. Butler,
1887 E. A. Harris,	J. W. Butler,
1888 W. A. Williams,	P. A. Conlin,
1889 William Hart,	J. W. Toole,
1890 William Hart,	J. W. Toole,
1891 Andrew Athy,	J. A. Thayer.

With the issue of the contest which will soon be joined, LIGHT has nothing to do. We simply introduce the heads of the respective committees and the public takes its choice. The gentlemen who compose the respective opposing committees have the interests of their parties at heart and with Free Trade and Protection, at odds, we are promised a campaign of education.

Entertainments.

The first Demorest medal prize speaking contest for a gold medal held in this city took place at Continental Hall, Tuesday evening. There were nine contestants from various Worcester county towns who have won silver medals. The contestants and the titles of their selections were as follows: Miss Maud A. Welch, Blackstone, "The martyred mother;" Miss E. Lulu Chamberlain, Worcester, "Young America's war cry;" Miss Lydia F. Gould, Milford, "Nationalism vs. sectionalism;" Miss Aura B. Randall, Clinton, "The City of Today;" J. J. Shea, Worcester, "Rum the worst enemy of working classes;" Miss Ethel F. Wetherbee, Westminster, "Plea for the fatherland;" Miss Helen M. Dexter, Clinton, "The voice from the poorhouse;" Miss Minnie E. Hunter, West Upton, "Our national curse;" Miss Bessie Royce, Palmer, "The deacon's Sunday School sermon." At the close of the contest the judges, W. H. Bartlett, Rev. H. J. White and F. W. Clark of Northampton, announced that the winner was Miss Dexter of Clinton. Miss Dexter was the youngest of the contestants being but thirteen years old. She now has the privilege of contesting in the grand gold medal contest which takes place at the national convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union at Boston in November. J. J. Shea and Miss E. Lulu Chamberlain of this city, received copies of works on elocution in recognition of their excellence in speaking. There are to be more silver medal contests. Those desiring to enter are requested to leave their names with C. E. Burnham.

Lothrop's Opera House.

Lothrop's Opera House has been doing tremendous business every evening this past week, and has large sized audiences at the afternoon performances. At both performances on Labor Day crowds were turned away, unable to obtain even standing room. The liberal policy of the management is being well repaid by the box office returns.

The attraction is "Lynwood," a military drama, in which H. Percy Meldon, as Victor Blanchard, appeared on Monday and Thursday nights. Mr. Meldon is always a painstaking actor, and deserves much credit for his work. Miss Ethel Tucker, who appeared here three weeks ago in "Queenie," acted the character of Lucille Carlyle, the heroine, in a manner which elicited well earned applause.

"Lynwood is preceded by a farce, entitled "Limerick Boy," which is well received. Messrs. Wilkes and McElroy, the Barrys and Miss S. Frances Newhall, who, by the way, shows considerable aptness for comedy, are all good in their respective parts.

Miss Katherine Rober is booked for next week, in that well known melo-drama, "Storm Beaten." Miss Rober is a good actress. Her "Fanchon" was well received by crowded houses, and she will undoubtedly do big business on her return engagement.

"Oh Sophy! I hear you kissed Mr. Rondo, the poet, in the conservatory last night." "Um-m-m?" Tell me. What was it like?" "Well he has a very pronounced literary taste." —Puck.

Kindergarten.

In spite of the storm quite a gathering of ladies met at Luther M. Lovell's Dix street Saturday afternoon to hear Miss Lucy Symonds, who is at the head of the Kindergarten Normal Training School in Boston, read a paper on the work of the teacher in that school. In appearance Miss Symonds is tall, perfectly free, easy carriage, and having a low pleasant voice.

At the tea table after my return from the meeting my little boy said that mamma had been to hear a lady read a talk at Mrs. Lovell's and I think that a good description, for though she read a lengthy paper still there were stories and bits of experience given us aside from the manuscript.

A sketch of Froebel whose system of work she follows was the opening page of her paper, giving hint of his unloved childhood and his ideas as he realized what might be done for the little ones. Miss Symonds says that in no other way can we successfully cope with the great questions of the day so well as by taking the babies as it were and educating them. They cannot enter the public schools till five years of age and before that time the years are lost which in the Kindergarten would be filled at least part of the time with useful instructive employment. She spoke at some length of the mission Kindergarten in Baltimore. The first work is of six balls and while some children have learned at home something about them there are those who know nothing of them. The baby mind is taught to think; learning the number, the size, the shape, the color in turn.

Before Pestalozzi every animal had more care taken of him than the children, meaning by this that more care was taken of the bodies of the animals than of the minds of the children. Even these days we spend money to buy everything for sons and daughters, while we allow them to read what they will, whether it be novels of a low grade or other poisonous works.

Begin to train the child at home and then let the school supplement it. Sometimes the home training is sadly lacking and then must the Kindergarten begin as early as possible.

The teacher must look after the physical and moral as well as intellectual training of the child. The teacher must know the ways and methods of the parents, and thus must visit each home in turn and talk with the parents.

Miss Symonds thought it would be a good idea if all nursery maids would study the system that they might be the better prepared to care for the little charges. At this point she read a cutting from the Transcript concerning the cruelty and carelessness of a maid at Nahant towards a child under her care.

The children are taught without text books and all is explained, they being allowed to ask questions at length on the subject in hand. The child is left to discover everything it can about the subject and when he fails to see any more of interest the teacher hints at something which opens a new channel of discovery. They learn how to play under the direction of the teacher; all are taught kindness and generosity. All faulty expressions are corrected.

Much of her paper might be applied to the teachers in all the schools as for instance the teacher must have a home idea of life and be able to give her high aims and enthusiasm to her pupils. She must be able to teach them power and control. She must teach a knowledge of the world and how to use it. After the close of the reading many asked questions on the subject and for a half hour Miss Symonds answered them, seeming to be thoroughly filled with knowledge of the work.

Only a sketch of her paper can be given but many who heard her wended to express a desire for some such free school in our own city.

It is interesting to note that this meeting was held in the very room where Miss Bardwell opened her Kindergarten in 1885, a school that has been continuous from that day to this, now being a part of Mrs. Morgan's school in the Y. M. C. A. building. Miss Kilham who succeeded Miss Bardwell is still in charge. Already, this school has been a source of much good.

Three Little Maids.

Three little maids at school are we,
As mad as school-girls e'er can be,
Fun all over, no longer free,
Three little maids at school!
Algebra is not much fun,
Compositions must be done,
All our lessons are just begun,
Three little maids at school.
Three little maidens most contrary,
Gone to the Ladies' seminary,
Bowed to its drum-drum melody,
Three little maids at school!

Character.

But this business of ignoring character is not confined to the church. I find the schools largely working on the same basis. If there be any one fact more patent than another concerning our public school system it is this, that the end of education is considered to be intellectual entirely. So far as reasonable amount of facts are concerned, the young doubtless get them; but how to use these facts for the public welfare, or for private enlightenment, is not a matter of direct training. Our boys lack moral will. They are not under training to be made into noble beings, but to be professional preachers, lawyers and doctors, or else skillful mechanics. All well so far as it goes; but it does not go far enough. These products will sell out for a price. These products do not comprehend the great moral laws of nature, when you teach my boy the gravity of matter, I want him also to know the equally certain gravity of moral life—that the soul that sins dies—that every degree of badness is death. And I will curse you if you teach my boy that he can sell his manhood and yet be saved by the righteousness of somebody else.

Have I said that there are not many noble generous, beautiful characters that are graduated from our schools and our churches. If I even implied that, I will take it back; but they are not so perceptibly the product of the schools and churches. The only character builder in our civilization is home. Where you get a wise father and a wise mother you will get noble children and noble citizens in spite of all hindrances.—E. P. Lowell in "Liberty and Life."

Worcester is interested in Prof. Michelson's recent discovery of a process for ascertaining the diameter of Jupiter moons. The application of the method has been successfully made at the Lick Observatory. Prof. Michelson's experiments in Light have long been noteworthy and his coming to Clark University was a great honor to the institution.

High School.

After many days, English pronunciation of Latin is abandoned in favor of Roman. Hereafter it is to be Kikero, and Wane, Wede, Weke, on the supposition that this form will better appease the manes of the defunct Romans. As all the New England Colleges have adopted the Roman pronunciation, of course it is best to conform, but the etymological value of the study, so far as English is concerned, is thereby completely lost. Colonel Higginson insists that Harvard has now three systems of pronunciation and until they agree he will stick to the English. According to one gentleman now a teacher in the Girl's Latin School, Boston, this Roman system is subject to such variation as the latest dispatches from Germany may warrant, and as for himself he prefers the old method. This statement is all the more valuable in that the gentleman was once a strenuous advocate of the late fad, but Cranmer like, he recanted and publicly declared his reconversion. After all, it makes very little difference to us but the change is better to the young people who must go from School to College and that transition should be made as easy possible.

Mrs. Albert Heydtmann, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, formerly a teacher in the Episcopal parochial schools of Waterloo, N. Y., has been visiting friends in this city. Mrs. Heydtmann left America to take a position as a governess to the Princess Kaulani, the niece of King Kalauka. The young princess is at present completing her education in Europe. Mrs. Heydtmann has presented to her sister, Mrs. L. Benedict, a set of photographs, including excellent likenesses of the present Queen Liliuokalani, and members of the royal family. There is also an impressive looking picture of the dead king lying in state, with his queen standing with bowed head by the side of the casket. Several views of the principal streets of Honolulu show many old and interesting looking buildings. Since her marriage Mrs. Heydtmann continues to keep up a lively interest in church and educational matters, being connected with many literary societies. She is deeply interested in church and missions, working unceasingly to spread the roots of education among the natives. While in this city Mrs. Heydtmann has been the guest of Mrs. L. Benedict and Mr. F. W. Gardner, her sister and brother. She sails for home this week.

Lake Glazier.

Capt. Glazier and party have been their trip to the headwaters of the Mississippi and have come back more than ever convinced that Lake Glazier is the true source. This idea is embodied in a report signed by all members of the expedition. Mr. John C. Crane of Millbury favors LIGHT with copies of Minneapolis papers containing extended notices of the return and of the results of the expedition.

School and College.

Polytechnic.

The entrance examinations last Tuesday, resulted in the admission of thirteen candidates. The number of pupils in the Institute is larger than ever before.

High School.

After rest comes work. So the nearly one thousand pupils of the school found out last Tuesday morning, when it again fell to their lot to return to school. Many were the regrets heard on every side, but one and all agreed that many were the good times to be had even in school days. One of the most noticeable things about the reopening was the fact that hardly a face was missed from its accustomed place. The three higher classes assembled in their last year's room in the morning and under Principal Wight and his efficient assistant, Miss Jillson, the work of readjusting the various classes was much facilitated. There was hardly a hitch noticeable, as both pupil and teacher worked in harmony. The morning hours were taken up with the distribution of books and the assignment of classes. All wore joyful faces and seemed, even if they did not feel—happy.

The pupils noticed several new features in the buildings as they approached. In the first place the Walnut street building has received a new coat of paint. This will prove a blessing to the entering class, as it was an eyesore to the departed classes. In the main school building an office has been built under the basement stairs for the use of the janitor and is a much needed addition. The hall in third story has been daintily frescoed and tinted and presents a charming appearance. Anyone familiar with the old beams in the same will look with delight upon the improvement. Under the direction of the most cordial janitor, Mr. Cummings, the rooms have all been cleaned and in many rooms the desks have been newly varnished. On the whole the building presents a very charming appearance and seems well suited to the needs of pupils.

Several changes in the faculty of the school have been made. Mr. Geo. E. Gardner, Professor in Latin, has been changed to the main building and will have charge of the classes in Rhetoric. Miss Mary Whipple will this year have charge of the "Tech" Preparatory class in Room 25.

The familiar face of Mrs. Jennie I. Ware, instructor in English Literature, was missed by those who had for so long a time been her friends. Their grief was greatly intensified when they learned that she had been removed in the same way by the same hand that had removed their beloved principal, just one year previous.

Miss Bridgman will this year have charge of the classes in English Literature in Room 17.

And now before closing, one word must be said about the entering class. About an hour previous to the time appointed for them to assemble in the Walnut Street building, they might have been seen in line, hanging on the fences opposite, or sitting on the stone work, waiting the time when their names should be enrolled upon that illustrious scroll.

As a class, the pupils are much larger than last year's entering class and among the young ladies quite a number of handsome and winning faces are to be seen. The entire class seemed bright and fresh, ready for the duties before them.

Among the scholars who will prepare for the "Tech" examinations in February, the following members of the class of '91" were noticed Chas. Harrington, Walter Haggood, Harry Barker, Allie Warren, Frank Pierce, Harry Davis.

The societies will hold their first meetings Friday night, when special reports will be given. It is understood that the rule requiring members of the second year class to wait ten weeks before entering the clubs, has been suspended and they will at once be allowed to take an active part.

Miss Parkhurst will have charge of Room 37 in place of Miss Whipple advanced.

Notes.

Mr. Fred C. Houghton, who failed to pass in French at the last "Tech" examinations, has returned in order to review the missing study.

The wall on the South side of the grounds has been reset and is quite an improvement.

A "First Proof" of the courses of study in the school has appeared and will be followed in the two lower classes the coming year.

Miss M. Edith Sessions, a member of the entering class, will be greatly missed at the Washington Street School, where she has been a favorite among her school-mates. Miss Sessions takes a special course.

Mr. Thomas F. Cummings, class of '91, has entered Holy Cross College. May he be the bright and shining light to that school that he was to this.

Mr. Coburn, a former member of the Worcester Academy, has entered the school in order to prepare for the Tech examinations in February.

Mr. George E. Gardner, in addition to his second year classes, will have a class of seniors in Political Economy. No abler man could have been found for the place.

Mr. Fred A. Whittemore, Class of '93 has gone into business with his father. His classmates wish him success in his new venture.

Harvey L. Wheelock enters Harvard this fall, Class of '91.

Miss Minnie Cogswell a graduate of the Shrewsbury H. S., Class of '91, has entered the senior class. X.

Burns—Carroll.

Miss Ada E. Carroll, daughter of Wm. T. Carroll, was married Wednesday to Robert R. M. Burns, by the Rev. H. J. White of the Pleasant Street Baptist Church. About twenty-five friends and relatives witnessed the ceremony. The bride, wearing orange blossoms, was attired in a handsome white silk dress, elaborately trimmed with lace, while the house was replete with potted plants and flowers. Rebellish furnished refreshments and on the midnight train the happy pair left for a wedding trip. On their return, they will reside at 342 Pleasant Street.

Itasca vs. Glazier.

MINNEAPOLIS, Sept. 7, 1891.

A. S. ROE, Esq.:—The head waters have been visited and the region far beyond. The united testimony of the gentlemen composing our party is that Itasca must give way to the Glazier Lake as the source of the great Mississippi. The measurements by the surveyors were most careful and the investigation by all concerned has been a thorough one and no other conclusion could be arrived at than that the lake to the South of Itasca, was the true source. In our opinion, as shown by facts submitted in the report, it is only a question of time as to when it shall be recognized as such by all geographers.

I send you a memento of our visit in the shape of a piece of birch bark from the island former made historic by Henry R. Schoolcroft.

Very truly,

J. C. Crane.

About Folks.

An exhibition of plates illustrating United States army and navy uniforms and battles on land and sea together with sketches of army life, is now in progress in the lecture room on the third floor of the Public Library building.

On the east wall are forty copper-plate etchings by the famous war artist E. Forbes. They are graphic sketches of life during the Civil War. On the south wall are nearly fifty prints, reproduced from H. A. Ogden's water color illustrations of United States army and navy uniforms from the Revolutionary War up to the present date. Below them is a series of colored plates representing battles in the Mexican War. On the north wall at the left of the door are pictures showing the uniforms worn at present by the navy. The remainder of the north wall is occupied with colored plates representing very vividly naval and land battles of the Civil War.

The exhibition is open to the public every afternoon from three to six o'clock and every Saturday evening. It will continue as long as the attendance warrants. There is no charge for admission.

A well known stock-actor, during the first performance of a piece, forgot a long and important speech at a time when the prompter wasn't on deck. He hesitated a moment and then led the heroine into a cabin. In ten minutes they emerged before the impatient audience, and the Mr.—said, "Now Darling, you know the story of my life."

A Dream.

Last night there came a sad, sweet dream,
That lingers fondly with me still.
'Twas sad, because I feared to wake,
Yet sweet, and captive chained my will.
I seemed to wake, as if from sleep,
With thrill of sound that came from far,
Like angel music strange and low,
While I shone a light from a four star.
At first my soul with rapture thrilled
Was lost to every sense of form,
As I gazed there seemed to grow
A vision I love, I ir, and warm.
Before my eyes in wonder wrap,
A figure stood all bathed in light,
A mild, divinely beautiful,
Whose perfect grace-entranced the sight.
I dare not speak or scarcely breathe,
Lest frightful, she should melt away
Into the air, yet all my soul
Swelt forth a cry to bid her stay.
Where lay her charm I cannot tell,
Nor what the wonder of those eyes,
But from their depths shone forth a love
That filled my heart with glad surprise.
How often in the past, I'd thought
Of her, who would be my ideal,
Whose being would complete my life
And in herself my fate reveal.
And now that I beheld her near,
I longed to claim her for my own,
But as I reached to take her hand,
The vision passed, the maid had flown.
(O dream, sweet dream, come back and live,
My heart will break without thee, dear,
Thou art my peace, my love, my life,
How can I live, and thou not near?
But no, she's gone forever gone,
Her face I shall behold no more.
Henceforth my life grows sad and drear,
I sail a sea, that has no shore.

Books and Bookmen.

Fonteny, the Swordsman, a military novel by For tne Du Boisgolev, Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York. Fifty cents in paper.

Here is a French novel as pure as a Sunday School book ought to be. The clash of resonating arms is heard from the earliest to the latest pages. The scenes are in the Paris, France and Spain of Napoleon's days, in those just preceding Josephine's dowfall. The writer introduces us to a duel, one of whose participants, young Fontinay, is from Martinique, a fellow islander of the Empress and throughout the book he is known as the American. He is an ideal personage, not yet twenty, but deeply in love with a young lady attached to the retinue of the Empress as her reader, Marguerite Gayre, the daughter of a General slain at Maringo. Her mother was a Spanish lady of great wealth and over the effort to secure her property much of the interest of the story centers, for thereby a relative, Montalvan, with all sorts of aliases is introduced. He leads a charm-d life, is well nigh ubiquitous, does manage to acquire all her ready wealth, battles the life of the Emperor, is a host in battle for Spain's defense and is finally run to earth and shot near his home.

The defense of Saragossa is well set forth, in fact the action of the story is excellent and full of life and zest. Of course, our hero, with his attendant Tournesol have no end of adventure, that is what the story is for, but he comes through, all right, in spite of assassin's knife, battle's dangers and fever's blight. He rapidly rises in rank, having early won the favor of the Emperor. He forgets not, at any time, his love for the fair young retainer of the Empress and when, soon after her death, the allies occupied Paris, he wedded the maiden and retired to his old home in the West Indies. The story is another of the almost endless series suggested by the acts of that more than mortal man, Napoleon. Battle scene, city siege and wearisome march are admirably depicted. In a word the story is of Frenchmen, without being Frenchy in the latest and most harmful sense. Any one who likes adventure with his novel, with enough of plot to give it zest will be pleased with Fonteny, the Swordsman.

Proceedings of the Worcester Society of Antiquity for the year 1890, published by the Society 1891. From the private press of Franklin P. Rice.

There are few better illustrations of the real value of the art preservative, than those which Mr. Rice presents. For a term of years, he has sent forth, at intervals, books and pamphlets that have helped store up the records of the past and that have, thereby, made them accessible to all readers. This volume is number XXXV in the series published by the society and is the last part of the ninth volume of the society's publications. In addition to a record of their regular meetings there are fine portraits of Guellermo Rawson, M. D., of Buenos Ayres and of the late Rev. Adin Balou of Hopedale with life sketches, the former by President E. B. Crane, the latter by the Rev. Carlton B. Staples of Lexington. There is also a valuable memoir of the late Rev. A. P. Marvin by the Rev. Dr. A. E. P. Perkins.

John E. Lynch contributes an article on the Dudley or Pegan Indians, and the Rev. S. D. Hosmer on the naming of city streets. In addition, there are the reports of the regular committees including one by Major E. T. Raymond in which is included a very interesting sketch of the life of Gen. George B. Bomer who is buried in our Rural Cemetery. The care and persistence of Mr. Rice have secured an honorable place for the publications of the society in all historical libraries.

The New England Magazine for September is as interesting as ever and that is saying a great deal. The illustrated articles are very full of half tones which in "The Brass Cannon of Campobello" carry us along the coast of Maine and in "Summer Days on the North Shore" introduce us to the home of many noteworthy people who make their homes in Lynn, Beverly and Manchester-by-the-Sea. "Edward Burgess and his Work" gives us a good notion of the famous yachting history of this distinguished builder; "The New South" is a well told and well pictured story of Beaumont, a rising Texas city. Then we go clear to the Pacific coast and learn the history of the University of California. The stories, long and short, are excellent while the essay on "Philip, Pontiac and Tecumseh" is one of the Old South Prize essays and is quite in keeping with the magazine and its objects. A fine portrait of James Russell Lowell accompanies Longfellow's, "The Herons of Elmwood," and a picture of Elmwood itself is found also. Not the least valuable portion of the number is The Editor's Table and of the viands served there, commend to us "The teaching of Morals in our Schools" and the remarks on the preservation of historic places in Massachusetts. We in Worcester, should be on the alert to preserve and mark our places of interest.

The September Century is filled with matter that should be read from beginning to end. The frontispiece is a portrait of T. B. Aldrich which will remind Worcester people of their North End Maecenas, and later is found a very good critique on his verse. George Kennan continues his description of Russian scenes, a series that has awakened unequalled interest in that oppressed country. California is still under discussion, this time in an article describing the getting to that land of gold in 1849 through Mexico. Henry Cabot Lodge's "Distribution of Ability in the United States" is the result of a vast amount of labor in searching and compiling. He finds out that the English blood in Massachusetts is ahead of all other races and sections. The Present Day Papers are represented in "The Government of Cities in the United States," by Seth Lov, Ex-Mayor of Brooklyn and now President of Columbia College. For the artist readers are given, "A Painter's Paradise" and "Italian Old Masters." "Treatment of Prisoners at Camp Morton" will have a wide reading for there is not a Federal soldier who has not resented Dr. Wyeth's article in the April's Century, this being an able and complete refutation of that slanderous statement. E. W. Howe gives a very readable account of Country Newspapers, and "The Possibility of Mechanical Flight" is discussed by S. P. Langley. In "Open Letters" pensions come in for an exceedingly vigorous discussion, the words of Prof. W. M. Sloane should be seen and read by every veteran. The subject is one that cannot be too fully and candidly treated. Eric A. Brac is as varied as ever.

The Lad es Home Journal, from the Curtis Publishing House, Philadelphia, Penn.

There is to be a little change in the domestic department of the paper soon. Miss Maria Parloa is to take charge of it though Mrs. Knapp will still answer letters sent to her. The sweet face of Will Carlton's wife greets us this month as one of the unknown wives. The continued stories still go on, and the editorial page is good as it always is. There is a picture of the boys new editor showing a liking for them in his face, and we know he can interest them. The children's page with its short story, and poems, and pictures, will no doubt please the younger members of the household. Though one might think from the cover which is blue, that the paper was of doleful character he will find it full of bright spicy things, combining instruction, with entertainment. Price $1 per year.

Good Housekeeping, published by Clark W. Bryan & Co., Springfield, Mass.

An illustrated poem starts the magazine well, and after that we look for more good articles beyond, and we have never been disappointed in finding them. The cooks will all be sure to read and comment on the many recipes, and no doubt many of them will experiment in the coming days. It has been too hot to experiment, but now in the cool weather much may be done in the way of new things which the magazine tells us of. We wish every body would read and follow the advice given in the article on saving. Even the children are remembered this month with rhymes on the fingers and toes. We think the little bits on everything will all be read for they serve to fill the spare minutes of the busy housewife. The price of the magazine is $2-40 per year.

Mrs. Burton Harrison, the author of "The Anglomaniacs," has written a new novel of New York life which The Century will print. It is said to deal with divorce.

Palmer Cox has signed a contract with The Ladies' Home Journal whereby his amusing little "Brownies," which he has made so marvelously successful in St. Nicholas and in his books, will hereafter belong exclusively to the Journal. Mr. Cox's contract begins with the first of an entirely new series of adventures of his "funniest little men in the world."

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, have issued A Brief Spanish Grammar, by Professor Edgren, of the University of Nebraska. It is a book of one hundred and twenty-five pages, and intended, primarily, for college classes and such students generally as would begin reading Spanish without waste of time, but with a basis of an accurate knowledge of the essentials of its grammar. It contains, therefore, a methodical survey of Spanish pronunciation, accidence (with exercises), syntax and versification.

The Farmer and the Government.

In view of the present timeliness of the sub-ct, The Century has arranged to print during the coming year an important series of articles on the general subject of Agriculture and the Government's relation to the farmer. Among the topics to be treated are "Agricultural Possibilities of the United States," "The Farmer's Discontent," "What the Government is doing for the Farmer," "Co-operation," etc. Mr. J. R. Dodge, Statistician of the Agricultural Department, Mr. A. W. Harris, of the same department, Professor Brewer of Yale, and others, are among the writers.

The Salem Press Historical and Genealogical Record, July, 1891. $1.50 per year.

This is No 1 of Vol. II of this publication. Very many excellent works have come from its establishment and some of the highest priced Americana, the rare tid bits of the collector, pertain to Salem and many were published by the Salem Press. This Quarterly is going an excellent work in printing Town Records and Genealogical lists, thereby making sure, for the future, what otherwise might be lost. In this number, we have extracts from the diary of Rev. Jude Damon of Truro, Mass., giving eleven pages of deaths in that Cape Cod town. It is full of Paines, Riches and Snows. There are abstracts from the Early Records of Bowdoinham, Me.; Inscriptions from Charter Street Burial Grounds, Salem, with valuable notes and queries. The editor is Eben Putnam, Box 286, Salem.

Notes and Additions to the History of Gloucester, second Series by John J. Babson, with an appendix containing indexes to Parts I and II. Salem Press Publishing and Printing Company, 1891.

Here is another indication of the very desirable work that all New England towns should be doing with their early written records. Several years ago, in 1876, there was printed a pamphlet containing the first series of Mr. Babson's notes. These covered the early settlers, but there was no index. In this second series, we have a complete index to the first volume as well as one for the second series. Books on local history where names are legion are well high useless unless thoroughly indexed. This second series is devoted to the early records, beginning with the First Church. Rev. Samuel Chandler kept a diary and from his annual volumes interesting selections are made showing a little how people lived a hundred and forty years ago. Then follow, year by year, transcripts of events from 1605 when Champlain, the French explorer, touched at Cape Ann to 1745. This volume is a series of notes on the original history and is doubly interesting in connection with that, though it is not wanting in value by itself. The index reveals the mention of more than 2,000 proper names, some of them many times. To all who care, in any way, connected with Gloucester the value of this book is inestimable. It may be had from the Salem Press Company for $1.50

The Cosmopolitan for September, Cosmopolitan Publishing Company, New York City.

This number is called "a woman's number." This does not mean that it is interesting only to women, but that all the articles are contributed by women. The opening article on Edouard Detaille, France's greatest military artist, is by Lady Dilke. "Malmaison in the Market," by Mary B. Ford describes the waning fortunes of the house celebrated for the residence there of the ill-fated Empress Josephine. Elizabeth Bisland writes of Tattersall's, the great London horse-market and the family from which it took its name. Countess Ella Norraikow writes of "Women's Share in Russian Nihilism." The second installment of "According to St. John," Amélie Rives new novel is in this number. Edward Everett Hale takes for his subject this month "The Work of Women," presenting some new thoughts on this, at present, much discussed subject. Other articles are "A Forgotten City," Eleanor Lewis; "The Ladies New York Club," Julia Hayes Percy; "The Evolution of the Society Journal," Mrs. Roger A. Pryor; "Society Women as Authors," Anna V. Dorsey; "I Mandolinista," a story by Daisy O'Brien; "The Romance of Count Königsmark," Molly E. Seawell; "Current Events," Minat Halstead; "On Certain Recent Short Stories," Brander Matthews. A novel feature introduced recently which is very pleasing is the placing under each of the leading articles of a small portrait and short sketch of the writer. It is needless to say that the illustrations are numerous and fine.

Outing for September, Outing Publishing Co., New York and London.

"Nomad" tells about hunting "On the Plains of Assiniboia;" Dr. C. J. Colles writes about "Trouting in the Metis Lakes;" Alex. Hunter tells the story of "A Coon Hunt;" and W. I. Lincoln Adams describes "Some Modern Achievements of the Camera." Malcolm W. Ford's article on "Running High Jumping" is concluded as are also Rev. Wm. C. Gaylor's "Canoeing on the Miramichi" and Capt. Dan'l Morgan Taylor's history of the "Massachusetts Volunteer Militia." John Seymour Wood's story, "Harry's Career at Yale" is continued and Part II of Capt. Kenealy's "Yacht Clubs of the East" finds a place in this number. There are a tennis story, "A Love Match," by Wm. Earle Baldwin; a poem, "The Camper," by E. Pauline Johnson; "A Day Among the Prairie Chickens" by George Taylor; a poem, "In a Meadow," by F. V. Keys; "The Home of the Red Deer in England" by Charles Turner; "Caught by a Wheel," a cycling story by W. G. Calderwood and the usual "departments."

In most attractive form, with wide margins, clear print and with a cover where the witch pins appear, Mrs. Upham has told in brief the story of the darkest days in American history. The name of Upham has long been associated with the history of the delusion and the one who now writes is the daughter-in-law of Charles W. Upham who, years ago, gave so exhaustive an account of the trouble. In the brief compass of 171 pages are compressed the main items of the tale with no essential point omitted, so that the reader can rise, from the perusal of this book, with a distinct notion of when the delusion existed, how long, how many suffered and why. Mrs. Upham has a charm of manner that effectually removes the horror that naturally surrounds this subject.

Thousands of people throughout the country, can trace their descent from some of the victims of that dread period whose bicentennial occurs next year. It was just half way between America's discovery and our own day. There are five plates reprinted from the larger work, reproducing houses and autographs. That the book has already reached its second edition is evidence of its worth. Salem is a quaint and curious town. Around it Hawthorne has thrown the halo of romance; but the truth is strange enough. Gallows Hill, next year, should be surmounted by a monument commemorative of the dread events of two hundred years ago. One dollar apiece from the descendants of the nineteen victims would rear a stately structure. Why not try it?

Miss Carrie M. Smith of Woodland Street was seriously injured in Montreal recently, being thrown from a carriage. She is now, however, improving.

The friends of Louis K. Thayer, of this city, will be pleased to know that he has successfully passed the entrance examination to the Boston Dental College.

The Hon. Joseph H. Walker and family have returned from their Summer stay in New Hampshire.

Alderman Warren C. Jewett of Ward 1, went home from the fair Friday evening and was soon afterwards taken ill, with symptoms of typhoid fever. He is under the care of Dr. C. H. Davis.

J. M. Russell and wife, Miss May E. Tattman, Miss E. S. Taylor and Miss A. L. Taylor are registered at Newport.

J. H. Coes and wife, Miss M. M. Coes and H. W. Anderson were Worcester guests at the Saratoga hotels recently.

The September number of the Farm News from Akron, Ohio, has a copy of a famous picture, very artistic, but the milk maid is on the wrong side of the cow. A farmer's paper ought to know better.

OVER ON OUR STREET.

As to vacations! We have one good citizen who says he takes his outing by spending a little more time on each trip to and from his home. He saunters along as though he had all day before him, and says it is all the vacation he needs and certainly it is all that he gets. Were many like him, shore and mountain resorts would have to shut up.

By the way he tells a good story of P. Church. Some years since, when the new minister was settled the question of giving him a vacation came up. At a regular parish meeting, it was proposed to give him four weeks off and to supply his pulpit while he was away. Deacon — was on his feet, at once, opposing, "I don't believe in this. I don't take a vacation myself and the Devil don't and I don't think the preacher should." Judge —, when he got a chance, ended the matter in favor of the preacher by remarking, "Well Deacon, I hope you and the Devil have a good time when the rest of us are off on our pleasure trip."

Nine-Thirteen as Best Man.

How a Messenger-Boy Balked an Angry Father.

Number 913 wasn't freckled and snub-nosed and he wasn't altogether tough. Most messenger-boys are both.

He used to swing his heels and wait for calls in District Messenger Station No. 67, West, which is up in a quiet part of the town, and where most of the calls are to private dwellings. Number 913 wasn't overworked, and put in considerable leisure thinking about the things that went on in the neighborhood. He knew which men who went into the drug-shop on the corner drank cocktails of a morning; he knew how many times a day the pretty Irish maid in the first house on the side street shook the house-mats at the big policeman as he passed. He knew a lot more things, too. He knew that the pretty girl in the house had a lover, and that the mother and she were trying to keep that fact, for some reason, from the father.

Nine-thirteen approved of love affairs on general principles, and he approved of this one with all his heart. He approved heartily, also, of its being concealed from the father, partly because he had no liking for the pompous, disagreeable-looking old fellow, and partly because it made things livelier and more interesting for himself.

Nine-thirteen knew that the father was kept out of the love affair by the way in which things were conducted. The old gentleman went off to his office each morning and returned about half-past four in the afternoon. Just at luncheon-time each day, the young man would turn the corner briskly and dash up the steps.

Sometimes his trap would come after luncheon, and the two young people and the mother would go for a drive in the park. Sometimes he came in his riding-clothes, and then she would come down the steps in her close, dark habit and silk hat, and they would drive off together. Nine-thirteen was a little disappointed that they didn't have the horses brought to the door. He wanted to see Miss Mabel mount.

Occasionally they neither drove nor rode, but just went out for a little walk, and sometimes they did none of those things, but sat in the house and talked.

Nine-thirteen knew that she was the daughter of Horace Wright, the broker, and that he was Frederic Brown-Romyne, who had a fine law office down in the Equitable Building. These statements would have meant more to the readers of the society columns in the newspapers than they did to Nine-thirteen. However, he was conscious of a magnanimous and paternal interest in the young people, and would have been glad to be of more service to them than merely carrying notes and boxes and other things of slight importance.

Once in a long while, the old man didn't go down-town for the day, and Nine-thirteen never looked in vain on these days for a summons from the house, whence he was sure to carry a telegraph blank, on which was written—

One of these days had come. Nine-thirteen had answered the call and dispatched the telegram. A few minutes later, Miss Mabel came down the steps and walked toward the avenue, with a stout gray-haired lady, who looked like Mrs. Wright, but who wasn't Mrs. Wright.

About twelve o'clock the door of District Messenger Station, No. 67, opened with a kind of dumb reverence to the impressive person of Mr. Horace Wright, broker. Taking a gold pen out of his pocket, he dipped it into the ink well, pulled a pad of blanks toward him and began to write. The telegraph operator was sitting at the instrument with his back toward the office. "Here, Clarke," he called out to his assistant, "take this message down":—

"Mabel Wright, 21 East—th Street, Something has happened. Must see you to-day. Will write where and which." F. R. B.

The words rang out loud and unmistakable, moving two persons to indiscreet and unusual behavior therewith. The stout, old broker stopped in the midst of a scratch as he heard his daughter's name. As the words went on, he grew first purple, then ashen. He stood motionless while Clarke wrote out the message. Then a large presence hovered at Clarke's side and a large hand was laid on the paper. "I will take that, if you please," he said, and the operator looked up, saw Mr. Horace Wright and slipped the telegram into an envelope.

When the message came in, Nine-thirteen was speculating how much a pair of patent-leathers, like those the operator was wearing, must cost. When he heard the address of the message, he jumped to his feet like a cat.

"The blame fool!" he whispered, under his breath. Then he watched old Wright, as he always called him. Nine-thirteen hadn't been to the Bowery theatres for nothing. He knew the look meant mischief. His head whirled for a minute and his mouth was dry. He didn't know he was pale, but he was. Nine-thirteen's life had been cast along in prosaic lines until now, and this was a great tragedy. He sat down to think, and in a minute things got clear. "That blame fool!" he said again, under his breath, and yet up to that very hour the operator had been his hero. Old Wright meant mischief, that was sure, and Nine-thirteen saw Miss Mabel's pretty face wet with tears and heard hot words poured out before her and—something had got to be done, and he had got to do it.

"Well, she aint ketchin' it this minute," quoth Nine-thirteen to himself; "she's away yet." Then he fell in a deep thought for a minute. Suddenly he seized a sheet of paper and began to write. What he wrote he trust into an envelope, stealthily directed it, and slipped it into his breast-pocket. Then he sat down again and seemed half-asleep for a few minutes.

When the clerk happened to be looking that way, Nine-thirteen jumped to his feet with a cry. "I forgot me old lady," he said, clapping his breast-pocket.

"What old lady?" said the clerk.

"The old dame as giv' me the letter," answered Nine-thirteen airily, pulling out the envelope; "she stopped me when I wuz givin' pas de house dis mornin' an' tol' me to take dis' an' I put it in me pocket an' I forgot, and here it is." Nine-thirteen's hand was going into his trousers as he spoke. He pulled out coins, mostly nickels, amounting to 50 cents. The clerk was looking dubiously at the envelope. It was addressed to Harlem. "Dey ain't no answer, and here's de money," 913 said. The clerk's suspicions went down. He gave the boy a check, and he darted off.

Not to Harlem, but straight down to the Equitable Building did he go as fast as the train would carry him. He gazed with lofty scorn at the buttoned office-boy. "I ain't doin' bizness wid you," he said, and pushing him aside, strode into the inner office, where he saw Mr. Frederic Brown-Romyne sitting at a big desk.

"De ol' man's ont'er ye!" cried Nine-thirteen breaking in upon him; "yer message come inter de station an' de blame fool read it out loud, an' ol' Wright wuz in der an' heard it, an' he tuk it off wid him, an' he'll give Miss Mabel hell!"

Nine-thirteen couldn't stop to choose his words, and he lost all fear of the slender, well-dressed young fellow who sat before him.

"Say that over again and say it slowly," said Brown-Romyne quietly, and Nine-thirteen went over it again. But she ain't dere," he finished; she's went away early wid her an'."

Young Brown-Romyne sat for a minute. "How have you come to know all this and why have you come to me now?" he asked.

Nine-thirteen looked sheepish. "I watched yer till I knew 'bout yer. I knowed de ol' man warn't in it kase you never comed round w'en he was dere, an' w'en he come inter de offis an' I seen he was on to yer, I come down ter yer dat de game wuz up, an' I done it 'cause—'cause—" Nine-thirteen paused; he wasn't used to psychological subtleties. "Miss Mable, she's a corker," he added. And the remark was neither irreverent nor irrelevant.

Young Brown-Romyne saw the whole thing in a flash. He was a big, manly fellow, and he did just what he would have done if Nine-thirteen had been big and wore patent-leathers and a twice-around tie. He reached out and shook Nine-thirteen's grimy paw fervently. Then he said four words that bathed the soul of Nine-thirteen in bliss: "What shall we do?" he asked.

"If I wuz youze," answered Nine-thirteen, judicially—and Brown-Romyne never smiled—"I'd git de bulge on de ole' jaw." 'D find Miss Mabel and get married 'fore I see him agin."

A sudden light broke into the young man's eyes.

"You say she went away with her aunt?" "I ain't dead sure, but I 'tought it must be a bin de ant. She looked like Mrs. Wright," answered Nine-thirteen, carefully.

Brown-Romyne pulled out his watch. It's two-thirty," he said; "her aunt lives in Brick Church. I fancy Mabel has gone to spend the day with her. It's worth trying, anyway. I'll do it. You're a brick, Nine-thirteen. I won't forget you." His hand moved toward his pocket. "No," he said, suddenly, rising and closing his desk, "come along; I may want you."

So down they went and pushed their way through Barclay Street's fruit-stalls and trucks and children and boarded the stuffy ferry-boat, with its smell of the stable. Brown-Romyne looked straight ahead of him without a word. "He's doin' de heavy thinkin' act," said Nine-thirteen to himself. And he was. When they had got safely into the train on the New Jersey side, he turned to Nine-thirteen: "If I find her," he said, "you shall be best man, Nine-thirteen." Nine-thirteen looked sheepishly delighted. He didn't know what the best man was.

It was eight o'clock when Nine-thirteen went quietly into Station 67 that night, and, sitting down, swung his feet nonchalantly.

"Here, you Nine-thirteen, give an account of yourself," growled the clerk: "you've been away since one o'clock. Where in—have you been?"

"'Been bein' bes' man to Miss Wright's weddin'," answered Nine-thirteen, coolly, "an' I couldn't git back no sooner, 'cause de bes' man hes to see de bridal couple off on deir weddin' journey. Mine wen to de Isle of Shoals;" he volunteered magnanimously.—Evening Sun.

A Well Known Restaurant.

There are many excellent restaurants in this city, but it is doubtful if one can be found better equipped with everything pertaining to a first class eating-house, than the cozy little dining hall at No. 32 Southbridge Street, which is owned and managed by Mrs. L. Benedict. It is situated but a short distance from Main street and is easy of access from all directions. Meals can be obtained at all hours. Strangers visiting this city will be amply repaid by giving this place a visit. Mrs. Benedict makes a specialty of catering to table boarders. The successful business established is well deserved.

Upton's Historic Houses.

NO. 2.

The Jonas Warren House.

On a certain day in the early part of the eighteenth century, while yet the Hassanamisco Indians occupied the hills and valleys of what is now the east central part of Worcester County—Keith Hill in Grafton being their central camping place—Upton, at that time having but recently been a part of Mendon and Sutton, four young men named Warren landed in Boston from Old England to seek homes in the then new world. They possessed strong arms and backs, stout hearts and youthful vigor. Able and willing to work, like many other young men of those days, they bade good bye to Old England forever, and came over to help found a New England where every man could be a freeholder. The system of town governments as established by the Pilgrims was then in vogue and took their fancy. They resolved to settle in the Province of Massachusetts Bay.

After staying a time in the town of Boston, they pushed westward, and arriving at Westborough, made a halt long enough to look about for farms. Two of the brothers decided to remain in Westborough. One went to Connecticut and there founded a home and family, the Pequot Indians having been conquered and subdued. The Narragansetts had ceased fighting the white settlers, for their leader King Philip was dead, murdered by one of his own trusted followers. Mendon and Sutton, the mother towns of southern Worcester County had become safe and were rapidly filling up with settlers.

While the territory now included in the town of Upton was free from severe battles between the whites and Indians, yet tales of cruelty are told of this vicinity that make one's blood curdle to relate or to hear them. At one home, yet standing in the edge of Hopkinton on the Upton road, a family was attacked, the man killed and scalped, the children's tongues cut out and the women carried into captivity. Grovlon Richardson of Upton is a direct descendant of Hannah Dustin, whose tragic story of capture while on a sick bed, the killing of her few days-old babe by an Indian warrior dashing its head against a tree, and whose wonderful escape, after killing all her Indian captors, while they were asleep, by cutting open their heads with an axe, is, or ought to be familiar to every school boy.

Upton was not settled by weak-kneed, faint-hearted men and women. They may have been eccentric in some of their views, inclined to be tenacious of their favorite doctrine of election, and, possibly, intolerant of any other, but that is to be attributed to their strong individualism, intensified as it was by isolated farm life and the free and often warm debates of town meeting. Reading the town records of Upton of a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago is like reading a romance. Imagination readily supplies the coloring for the terse, dry and quaint entries of the town clerks of those days. But to return to the four brothers. Jonas Warren, one of the four brothers, found a spot beside a stream, in a beautiful valley half way between Westborough and Upton on the road leading from Westborough to Upton, and thence to Mendon, Woonsocket Falls and Providence. Upton had just been incorporated (A. D. 1735) so Jonas cast in his lot with the new town. A large tract of land called "the Sutton Grant" extended through the northern part of the town, and of these "Sutton grant proprietors," Jonas bought his farm. Here Jonas built his house in 1741, nine years before William Howard built the Isaac Johnson house described in my last article. But a house and a man do not make a home, so Jonas took for a wife Lydia Harrington of Waltham. Then he had a home.

The Warren house was originally 24 by 8 feet with a huge stone chimney which still remains, and has a foundation sixteen feet square, and at the point where it passes through the roof it is five feet square. There are stones that measure four by two feet on the outside face and are of unknown depth. Strong men they must have been to have handled such rocks. It should be remembered here that students of colonial history can often determine the age of houses by their style of architecture. Chimneys in country houses, except in rare cases, were made of stone, from the first settlement of the country until about 1750. Some were made later. Brick had to be imported from England, and the early settlers were in such circumstances that they were obliged to make their homes with their own hands. Stones in the form of great boulders lay around in abundance, so they simply erected the chimney with the foundation, using the same material for both. But as the larger towns increased in size there was a demand for brick which some men took advantage of to open brick yards. Not long before the Revolution brick became cheap enough for new settlers to use.

When additional children kept coming into the Warren family the old house became too small, so Jonas made a sixteen foot addition on its twenty-eight foot side. The beams are something marvelous, of hewn white oak, as sound today as when the strong armed men put them in place 150 years ago. Austin Warren, a descendant of Jonas, and the present occupant, has a photograph of the old home taken before he modernized it by putting on sawed clapboards and substituting four paneled windows for the little old fashioned six by eight lights. There are three old fashioned ovens and fire-places, one of those latter being in an upper room. The doors are still the heavy old fashioned kind. Near the east door a few feet off is the well which Jonas dug. An old fashioned sweep draws the best and coolest water in Worcester County.

One of the original "Sutton proprietors" was named Hall, a name which is now common in Sutton. One of the original owners of additional land which Jonas bought was named U'riah Baker; another was Pratt, after whom Pratt Hill and Pratt Pond are called. Pratt Brook was a well known stream from which some farms were measured. For over 100 years it has been called "Cob" Brook from being the scene of a theft. A worthless man, who lived by fishing and stealing, stole a lot of green corn one day and after roasting it, he ate the corn and threw the cobs under the bridge. They were found and somehow, the name "Cob" has clung to that brook ever since.

A field near by is to this day called "the flax field" where flax was grown for many years. Farmers then had to grow what they ate and wore. The women made flax and the wool of sheep into garments. There are in the attic of the house the same loom and spinning wheel used by the women of Jonas Warren's family and by each succeeding generation until the present Mrs. Warren (Sarah F. Porter), found it cheaper to buy modern machine woven cloth, than to use the old loom. Cloth made in those days was lasting, for the present Mrs. Warren has articles made on this loom that are yet substantial. One is the old-fashioned pocket which our grandmothers used to wear. It is about 150 years old. She also has one that had belonged to her own mother's family.

The Warrens also made weavers' reeds for hand looms, one of which Austin has given to me. They also kept a cooper's shop, saw-mill, etc. Jonas Warren had eleven children all of whom lived to a good old age. One, Daniel—Austin's grandfather,—died at 74; another, Eunice, lived to the age of 103 years and six months; another, Jonathan, died at 92; another, Sarah, died at Amherst aged 99; one, Susannah, lived to be over 90. All but Daniel lived to be over 80. Hiram Warren,—Austin's uncle,—who was 86 August 31st last, past, is the son of Daniel, Austin's grandfather. There are now living, five generations: Austin having a great grand daughter, a child of Daniel Benson, son of Mrs. Alice Benson, Austin's daughter; Hiram Warren being the oldest generation living. Jonas Warren was for many years a deacon of the church in town. He died in his 89th year. Daniel, his son, was for many years captain of a military company.

All the generations were singers and their voices have been heard for upwards of 150 years in "meeting" and in modern choirs. There are now three generations of the Warrens in the Upton Brass Band. Alice, Austin's daughter and wife of Charles H. Benson, has been for several years chorister of the Congregational church in Upton. Most of Jonas' sons became farmers. One son, Moses, became a minister and settled in Wilbraham; another, Aaron, twin to Moses, became a surgeon in the United States Navy and afterwards settled in Wells, Me.

Hunting was common in Jonas' time, for bears and other beasts of prey abounded. Robert Bradish was a neighbor of Jonas' living on Merriam Hill in what has always been known as the "Merriam District" in Grafton. Bradish, one early autumn, had a fine field of corn, and while it was yet in the milk, his other work being well along, decided to take his family on a trip up country to see some of his folks. Now a days we call it "taking a vacation." He was gone four weeks. Some of his neighbors had seen bear tracks about but as the sheep and calves were not disturbed and most of the men being busy, no special hunt was made for him. One morning, Mrs. Oliver Whitney, another neighbor—people were neighbors to each other who lived a mile or more apart—saw a large bear making his way through the tall meadow grass in the direction of the hill lying north-east from Warren's place. She waited till the bear was well away from the road and then hurried to Jones and notified him. He and one or two other men, took their old flint locks and pursued the bear, following his trail until he was overtaken near what is now the Aaron Partridge place. There Jonas shot him. The animal was so heavy that they had to get a yoke of oxen and a sled to get the carcass home. The bear was exceedingly fat having fed nearly all the time of Robert Bradish's absence on his delicious corn. The field was nearly half ruined. The bear weighed 400 pounds, so Jonas and his neighbors had plenty of meat that winter. This true bear story has furnished entertainment for scores of children of the different generations since then.

Another incident shows of what stuff the women were made. An Indian trail, or pathway, portions of which can now be seen, led from Keith Hill over George Hill, down through the valley by Jonas Warren's house, then up over Bear Hill. It is so called to this day—in Hopkinton to the valley where Charles River begins and terminated near Natick, where John Elliott, the Indian apostle used to teach and preach. There were yet at that time, many members of the Hassanamisco Indians living. One time when Jonas was gone to Westborough, a body of Indians marching on their trail, stopped just in front of the house and made as though they would stop there. Jonas' wife, Lydia, was alone with the children. She went to the door and, pointing down the trail, ordered the Indians to move on. In their low-toned guttural voices, they talked among themselves a moment, then, evidently considering what kind of a woman was talking with them and that her husband might not be far away, they took up their goods and marched on.

The Warrens have spread over a good part of the country. Many an enterprising and successful business firm that has the name "Warren" as a part of its title owes its success to the blood that was in the four Warren brothers' veins. Music is in their souls, good health in their blood and intelligence in their brains.

AARON F. GREENE.

A Famous Snow Storm Sleigh Ride Party.

DEAR LIGHT—On this hot summer's day there strangely comes to me, blown o'er the snow drifts and the storm of sixty winters gone, the cooling breath of memory.

I see a joyous host, a party gay. I hear the shouts, the song, the horn. I see the stage load's long array, with its happy trusting throng, who in the sunshine's bright bow, dreamed not storm clouds would o'er them lower. And I wonder if of all that throng, through life's winter's drifts, one single soul is still struggling on.

As reminiscences of Worcester's olden days are of interest to all your readers, to the Students as participants, and to the Moderns, as students of history, I send you an account of a famous sleighride and party of the far, far away.

Some sixty years ago or more (I never can remember dates) Reuben Munroe kept a hotel about four miles from Main street on the old Millbury road, later known as the Marm Beard (bad) place. It was a famous resort for pleasure parties, who used to go down there, to work off their surplus energy, not in croquet or lawn tennis,—games then unknown, but in the old fashioned game of ten pins. As Alex. Voter,—the French confectioner, whom you mentioned recently in LIGHT,—used to say: "Let's go down to old Munroe's and roll de ten pins and get some good philip, (flip)" (For the Prohibitionists were not at logger-heads then with the dispensers of spiritual joys.) The family consisted of Mr. Munroe and wife, and four or five daughters, bright, intelligent stylish girls, who were favorites in society, and two sons. One winter they decided to give a party and sent out invitations to nearly all of the young people of the town, and as there was good sleighing, they were largely accepted, and a very large party, filling six or eight four-horse stage sleighs, started from Main street in the afternoon, with shouts and song, and merry horn amid the cheers of the stay-at-homes, who had gathered to see them off.

Early in the evening, there came up a fierce snow storm that raged through the night,—a perfect blizzard like that of a few years ago,—blocking up the roads and making it impossible for the party to start for home.

The next morning they made the attempt but soon got stuck in the drift. And the ladies in party dress, and the gentlemen, in their best clothes, were obliged to wade through the snow back to the hotel, and give it up. The larder had not been fortified for so long a siege, or so large a crowd, and they soon at their hosts out of house and home, and foraging parties were sent out through drifts, to the neighboring farm houses to bring in stray chickens, turkeys, or anything available for the larder. And the company began to feel that, like the beleagued hosts of Paris, of a later date, they would have to fall back upon Horse-beef, of which, they had a large supply.

The next day a large company of volunteers started from Main street with ox teams, shovels, and brooms, to break out the roads and rescue the beleagued hosts. After a hard day's work, they arrived late in the afternoon to find a gay, but bedraggled and famished crowd, and to be hailed with shouts of welcome. The teams were soon hitched up, and the procession started for home, where, after a few mishaps in way of tipovers, they arrived, to be received by the cheers of a large crowd, gathered to welcome them home. They soon dispersed to their several homes to relate to anxious listeners their adventures and to bear in mind through their lives the memory of that famous snowstorm sleighride party. And I wonder if a single member of that party is still living in the city? If so, I wish they would report through LIGHT, and perhaps they can fix the date and verify my story.

Effects of Tea on the Skin.

If you place a few drops of strong tea upon a piece of iron, a knife-blade for instance, the tannate of iron is formed, which is black. If you mix tea with iron filings, or pulverized iron, you can make a fair article of ink. If you mix it with fresh human blood, it forms with the iron of the blood the tannate of iron. Take human skin and let it soak for some time in strong tea, and it will become leather. Now, when we remember that the liquids which enter the stomach are rapidly absorbed by the venous absorbents of the stomach, enter into the circulation and are thrown out of the system by the skin, lungs, and kidneys, it is probable that a drink as common as tea, and so abundantly used, will have some effect. Can it be possible that tannin, introduced with so much liquid producing perspiration, will have no effect upon the skin? Look at the tea drinkers of Russia, the Chinese, and the older people of America, who have so long continued the habit of drinking strong tea. Is it any wonder that they dark colored and leather-skinned?

Kings of Judah.

BY S. CRENSHANK, AUTHOR OF PRE-DETERMINATION.

The kings of Judah nan'ing, now we come,
To Solomon's successor, Rehoboam.
Atahiah him succeeds, a w-ride prince
And wins the sorest fray, Before or since,
Then Asa reigns; sincere in righteous ways—
And next Jehoshaphat, whom all men praise—
Jehoram next, who lays his brethren low—
Then Ahaziah, slain by Jehu's bow—
Six years, his place, by Princess Athaliah
Is filled; then Joash reigns; then Amaziah,
Ill star'd Uziah, who a leper dies—
Gives place to Jotham, politic and wise.
'Tis Jotham is the only Jewish king,
(Of whom we read no vile nor 'dish thing')
Next Ahaz—famed in Judah and abroad
For doing evil in the sight of God.
Good Hezekiah, next in line we see,
The photograph of Truth and Piety.
Next eminent Manasseh—Amon then,
Then young Josiah, favorite of men,
Rules righteously, but to the nation's woe
Is killed in war, at purple Megiddo.
Jehoahaz a partial reign enjoys
His independence Egypt's king destroys.
Jehoiakim succeeds, but, soon undone,
Is led a captive bound, for Babylon,
As is Jehoiachin—then list of all,
Weak Zedekiah sees his nation fall—
Dies in a city that he cannot see—
Said trophy of the great captivity.
Judah's fate, in grief and anguish deep,
On foreign willows hang their harps and weep.
The shattered dynasty then disappears,
Which had existed twice three hundred years.

Labor Day.

Now that scientists are succeeding in making rain when they wish, there is another very decided want in a reverse way, i. e., to make it stop raining when we have had enough. It is a poor rule that won't work both ways. Such an ability would have been in urgent request last Labor Day. How it did rain! What disconsolate faces! The most of the stores were closed so very many people were in the streets. No business doing. The only happy people were the umbrella vendors, and the rubber dealers. The processions were aching to march; but "such weather." With a dash of snow thrown in it would have been a regular St. Patrick's Day. Well, we can't help the rain and disappointment is the lot of humanity.

Good to Eat.Potato Puff.

To two teacupfuls of salted, peppered, and finely-mashed potatoes add two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, and beat to a white cream. Stir in thoroughly two yolks of eggs that have been beaten separately until very light, and then a teacupful of sweet milk. When the whole is nicely blended, add the whites of the eggs, stir lightly, pile the mass at once upon a hot buttered dish, and bake about ten minutes.—Housekeeper's Weekly.

Potatoes With Cream.

Select small potatoes; pare a strip round and cook in boiling salted water till tender. Drain and peel them. Put them in a dish, sprinkle with salt and pepper, put a bit of butter on each, and pour over them one cup of hot cream. Omelet.

Select one egg for each person; two eggs make a small omelet. Beat the eggs well till light, season with pepper and salt and a spoonful of finely chopped chives or shallot and parsley; put a little butter in a pan, and when it is melted and hot, put in the eggs, etc., and fry. When the under side is colored and the top is about the consistency of scrambled eggs, slip it out of the pan into a hot dish, fold it over and serve at once.—Boston Budget.

Frozen Almond Cream.

Blanch and pound one-half pound of Jordan almonds to a paste. Scald one quart of cream in a boiler; add the almonds, yolks of seven eggs and one-half pound of sugar (beaten together to a cream previously) and stir all over the fire until they begin to thicken; take from the fire and beat for five minutes. Strain through a fine sieve and freeze. When frozen, remove the dasher, and fill the centre with cherry, damson and apricot jam; cover and stand for two hours. When ready to serve, dip can in hot water and turn on a dish.—Washington Home Magazine.

Old Fashioned Sponge Cake.

A short time ago I prepared for a few intimate friends a dinner which was ordered by one of the gentleman present, and served according to his directions. It was not exactly the payment of a wager on my part, though the occasion for it was somewhat similar, after all.

Among other things which he desired to form a part of the meal was some old-fashioned yellow sponge-cake. "Not angel's food," he declared. "That's good, of course; but I want some regular old-fashioned sponge-cake."

Though it is a very simple cake I have often heard people say they were never quite sure of it, and I want to give others the benefit of the recipe which absolutely never fails if one has an oven that can be depended upon.

Beat the yolks of three eggs as light as possible; add one cup of granulated sugar and beat again; then add four tablespoonfuls of hot water. Have ready the beaten whites of the eggs, which should be put in next, and finally, a cup of flour into which one heaping teacupful of baking powder has been thoroughly mixed and sifted; flavor, and bake in a moderately quick oven.

If you are careful to have the water very hot, and are expeditious about putting the cake together, you cannot fail.

To my mind, this cake is much nicer for Charlotte russe than lady fingers, which so many recipes call for.—The Household Monthly.

You have no idea of what is possible in the line of lamps? Beauty, price.

The collection we have just completed we believe has never been equaled in these two important points. A most wonderful exhibit of American ingenuity, enterprise and artistic ability in lamp manufacture.

New processes, new materials, new results.

It you want light

and plenty, of it, cleanliness, freedom from odor and absolute safety, you can have it.

The genuine "Rochester" and the newer "B and H", have, as all good things do have, countless imitators, cheaper, very likely, inferior, most surely, and wholly dependent upon their extensive advertising for even a limited sale. There are no lamps to be compared with the "Rochester" and "B and H." central draft, for quality or power of light.

Their sale is as wide

as the world. They go to every country. We don't "control" them. Any reputable dealer will sell you one. We simply offer a larger selection than others, the full line in fact of both makes and give you the price advantage that comes from large buyings.

Dainty colorings

in parlor lamps, beautiful hand painted vase lamps with bisque finish and silver trimmings, table lamps of Royal Copper, Ormolu, gold and silver finish, and all possible combinations of porcelain and metals.

Mexican onyx

is largely used in Piano Lamps, and is much less expensive than in years past. The opening of new mines has made it possible to sell a fine lamp for less than the former price of the table alone.

We call it good.

A full silver plated "Rochester" piano lamp complete with large umbrella shade, and patent extension flag.

And so we say whatever is good in the lamp business, we have it. Whatever is the newest you will surely find it on our tables. The lowest price you will hear quoted will be our price, lastly, whenever and wherever you buy a central draft lamp, insist upon having the Rochester or B and H, they and they only are sure to be right in every way.

Household.

If your child is cross do not punish him but distract his mind from the subject that annoys him. If he continues to be cross, suppress his stomach, and assure yourself that this is in perfect order; a troubled digestion is the root of much bad temper.

A woman is happy just in proportion as she is content, writes Edward W. Bok, in the September Ladies' Home Journal. The sun has a way of changing the spots upon which it shines. Especially is this true of our land, where one is up to-day and down to-morrow, and vice versa. The wisest woman is she who trusts in a tomorrow, but never looks for it. To sit down and wish that this might be, that that would be different, does a woman no good. It does her harm in that it makes her dissatisfied with herself, unpleasant to her friends, and makes her old before her time. Happiness is not always increased in proportion to enlarged success. This may sound like an old saw, and I think it is, but there is a world of wisdom in many an old proverb just the same. Contentment is a wonderful thing to cultivate. There would be fewer premature old women in the world if it was given more of a trial and it became a more universal quality in womanhood.

There may be some reality in the danger explained by a writer in the New York Tribune, who recently described the butler in a large country house arranging the flowers with which the room was filled, renewing those in each receptacle with the greatest skill, but merely adding a little fresh water to that already polluted by the blossoms of the day before. "I knew by experience," says the commentator, "how fetid and offensive water becomes from decaying stems of plants, and I spoke to my friend upon the subject, believing as I did that the standing water in so many open receptacles was positively unhealthy. 'How often do you clean the vases completely, James?' she inquired. 'We wash everything once a week, ma'am,' he answered respectfully; 'the rest of the time I only take out the flowers that are faded and replace them with fresh ones.' 'Just take out those,'" she directed, pointing to a big yellow bowl of irises. As he lifted the wet mass from the dish the odor was so sickening that it filled the whole room. Now here, I thought, is surely a question for a physician, and yet I have never heard it mentioned. Wherever houses are profusely decorated with flowers, this stagnant water is presumably standing constantly in living-rooms, and people are continually breathing what, even out of doors under the fresh winds of heaven, is generally accounted unhealthy.

Red Ants.—A few years ago I was bothered with small red ants. I could not find the nest. Boiling water did not thin them. I tried poison. That pleased them; they grew and thrived on it. At last one day, I put a dish of rags soaked with kerosene in the closet. While that was there I did not see an ant. I kept it there two years;—then they were all gone. I have not seen an ant for three years.

BY JOHN WENZEL.

I sadly needed rest,
And thought it would be t
For me a trip to take
Down to that famous lake
Chaugogagoggmanchauggogagungamaug.

And for about a week,
That name I used to speak
Five hundred times each day,
Till I could glibly say
Chaugogagoggmanchauggogagungamaug.

One day I thought I'd take
A swim in that old lake,
But scarcely had I been Three seconds swimming in Chaugogagoggmanchauggogagungamaug.

When I began to sink,
And would have drowned, I think,
If then there had not been
Some boatmen rowing in Chaugogagoggmanchauggogagungamaug.

That name fixed in my head,
Caused it to sink like lead,
Unrescued I'd have been Devoured by fishes in Chaugogagoggmanchauggogagungamaug.

If you a trip should take
Down to that famous lake,
You may fall in some day,
So pray don't learn to say
Chaugogagoggmanchauggogagungamaug.

Librarian E. M. Barton and wife have been in Maine.

Post 10, G. A. R., is taking active measures to secure quarters in Washington at next encampment.

Rev. Dr. Gunnison during his vacation swung almost around the circle. In an Oakland, Cal., church he heard not his own funeral discourse, but some very flattering remarks concerning himself as expected a week later. It might have been much worse.

Percy B. Lloyd, who will be remembered as a former High School boy, has returned to Worcester for a visit. He purposes to enter the Boston University Law School soon. Since leaving Worcester he has been graduated from the University of Southern California at Los Angeles. His father, the Rev. Wm. T. Lloyd, died in Los Angeles, July 22, 1890.

Mr. and Mrs. Harrison G. Otis and Mr. and Mrs. John Midgley left Wednesday for a week's stay in South Bristol, Me., where they will be the guests of Hon. Pinchbas Ball.

Miss Camille M. Clark, whose advertisement is an instructor in vocal music appears in another column, is the soprano in the Webster M. E. Church.

Misses Mollie and Annie Taft, who have been spending the Summer in Evanston, Ill., have returned. They were the guests of Mr. Henry G. Savage.

An item has been going the rounds of the press to the effect that Dr. Edward Everett Hale is seventy-nine years old, but it was a great surprise to find the same in last Sunday's Spy. As the Doctor was born in 1822 he has ten years to live before reaching that venerable figure. As the Spy people were once his parishioners here they must have known better had they only stopped to think.

About Folks.

Old time Base Ballists are looking forward to a great contest Sept. 19th, when a club made up of those who used to play the old fashioned game before the war will play a game for the benefit of the Old Men's Home. It ought to be the most interesting event of the kind of the season. Excitement used to run high between the Worcester Mechanics and the Up-ton Excelsiors.

Only recently, Milford was in high feather over the probable coming to that town of a large boot manufacturing firm from Ashland. A large sum of money was subscribed by all, rich and poor, but now it seems that not getting a fee simple of the township, the company will not go after all. Is it not a fitting ending of such a way to enhance the interests of a community? Why should Smith, who is a poor artisan, pay money to boom Brown's business when the latter is already rich? It is not sound political economy.

Mrs. Sarah M. Conant, nee Bowers, of Smithland, Ky., is visiting Mrs. F. A. Robinson of this city. She was formerly of Leominster, a cousin of Chaplain Ball of the 21st Regiment.

Misses Ada M. Carter, Anna L. Curtis and Elizabeth Boyd have gone to the State Normal School at Framingham to be trained as teachers. They were in the last class at the High School.

Walter D. Berry, class of '90 W. H. S., and who was in the Christian Training School last year in Springfield, will next year have charge of athletics in Illinois State College at Jacksonville.

Miss Mamie Riley of Springfield is visiting friends in this city.

Through no intentional fault, the name of Henry C. Wheaton was omitted last week from the list of chairmen of the Republican City Committee. His time was in the exciting local campaign of 1887. W. B. Sprout, Esq., was secretary. The dates for reorganizing the city committees having changed, in this year the names of two chairmen appear.

Mention was made last week of Mr. F. L. Emory in connection with the West Virginia University. Mr. Emory has lost very little time since leaving the Polytechnic in 1887. In the following September, he went to Washington, in the High School. May 1, 1890, he began the establishing of industrial education at the Concord, Mass., Reformatory, and here he remained till Aug. 1, 1891. On the 11th of the same month, he reached Morgantown, West Va., and set about devising a plan for the Manual Training department of the University. He holds a place of great trust and responsibility. On his leaving the Reformatory, very flattering opinions of him were expressed by the superintendent and by the local press.

Mr. C. C. Estey of the Boston Transcript office is visiting his brother, Mr. James L. Estey, 27 William Street. Years ago Mr. Estey was employed in the Spy office. He is, also, a clergyman of the M. E. Church.

A Triolet.

Shy proud Nalette,
Not one kiss at parting!
Must I think you a heartless coquette,
Who plays at love! and yet
Shy proud Nalette,
Your face shows sweet regret,
From thine eyes sad tears are starting,
Shy proud Nalette,
Not one kiss at parting!
—N. Goddard Austin.

To the Honorable the Judge of the Probate Court in and for the County of Worcester:

Respectfully represents Michael J. Power of Southborough in said County, and Annie E. Power his wife, that they are of the age of twenty-one years or upwards and are desirous of adopting Harry James Parker, a child of Delia G. Parker of said Southborough, in the County of Worcester and Cecil H. Parker of Denver, Colorado, which said child was born on the third day of July, A. D. 1887.

The laying of the corner stone of the new Free Baptist church, corner of Jaques Avenue and Wellington street, will take place next Tuesday afternoon.

METHODIST.

Rev. W. T. Worth, pastor of Grace Church began last Sunday evening a series of special sermons on practical topics of the time. His subject was "Perils in our Reading; what are we reading? Does it help or hurt us?" Tomorrow evening he will preach about "Perils in our Companionship." The other subjects to be discussed the following Sundays are "Perils in our Business Methods" and "Perils in our Pleasures."

The Preachers' Meeting for Worcester and vicinity will be held in Grace church Monday morning at 10 o'clock. The following papers will be read:—Church Life and Progress—How Promoted? Rev. J. Mudge. Do the times demand new methods in church work? Rev. C. F. Rice.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary society of Trinity church met Thursday afternoon and evening at the residence of W. S. Clark, 23 John street. Officers were elected as follows: President, Mrs. H. H. Houghton; vice-president, Mrs. C. F. Green; secretary, Miss Ida Kenney, treasurer, Dr. Jennie S. Dunn; Mrs. W. S. Clark was elected life member of the association and a delegate to the meeting of the national association to be held in Meriden, Conn., in October. Supper was served and there was a musical and literary program.

PRESBYTERIAN.

The First Presbyterian church held its first services in its new church on Kilby street, recently purchased from All Souls' parish, last Sunday. Rev. Thomas Atkinson, the pastor, preached morning and evening.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Rev. Rufus M. Taft has been conducting special religious services every evening this week at the Piedmont branch chapel, corner Bigelow and Endicott streets.

Those who attended Central Church Sunday, are deeply indebted to Miss S. Christine MacCall of Paterson, New Jersey for her fine singing. At the morning service Miss MacCall sang "Ye Redeemer" and in the evening "Fear ye not, O Israel," both by Dudley Buck. Miss MacCall, is a pupil of the celebrated prima-donna Mme. Florenza. D'Arona who taught as assistant to the world-known Lamperti at Milan, has a rich contralto voice of great compass and mellow quality. Her high notes are taken with ease and remarkable clearness and her lower notes are deep and resonant. Miss MacCall will be very pleasantly remembered by those who have heard her sing and a warm welcome awaits her whenever she revisits Worcester.

On account of many requests, the lecture given at the Old South Church last April by A. L. Bacheller A. M., of Lowell, on characters in English history, illustrated by ladies and gentlemen in costume, will be repeated at the same place this Fall or Winter.

UNIVERSALIST.

The Chapin Club of the First Universalist Church has appointed committees to take charge of its series of meetings this winter. The dates are subject to change if found inconvenient for the committee. The series is as follows:

Sept. 29, social, Miss M. Louise Rice, chairman; Oct. 27, literary, Rev. Dr. Gunnison, chairman; Nov. 24, social, Edward B. Fish, chairman; Dec. 22, musical, Miss Maud Knowlton, chairman; Jan. 19, social, Miss Clara Moore, chairman; Feb. 16, dramatic, Edward C. Fuller, chairman; March 15, social; April 12, annual meeting.

Y. P. S. C. E.

About fifty Christian Endeavorers from this city went to Shrewsbury last week Tuesday evening in response to the invitation from the Endeavor Society of the Congregational church of that town. Most of them went in busses but a few went in private teams. The Shrewsbury society had planned for a lawn party but as the weather was very unfavorable the visitors were entertained inside the church. Besides those from Worcester there were representatives from Holden, West Boylston and other neighboring towns, swelling the number of visitors to about one hundred. There was first a program of exercises in the church auditorium, which began with the singing of Christian Endeavor songs. H. C. Abbott, the president of the local society welcomed the guests in a few well chosen words and was followed by Rev. Mr. Broken-shere who offered prayer. Mr. Howe, the bass singer of the church choir contributed a solo and President Tucker of the Local Union gave an address on the work of the Union. During the next ten minutes prayers were offered by various members. A song followed and the program was concluded with a prayer by President Tucker. After a half hour's social, the guests marched to the vestry where they were served with ice cream and cake. The start for home was made at about 9:45. Undoubtedly if the weather had been better more would have gone from this city. However those who did go felt very much pleased with their reception as well as with the beautiful church itself, which has been recently remodelled. The Shrewsbury people were delighted to welcome among the visitors from Worcester, Rev. I. L. Wilcox, until recently their pastor, but now pastor of Park Congregational Church of this city.

Next Tuesday evening at Pleasant Street Baptist church, the monthly meeting of the Local Union will take place. Commencing at 7:30 there will be singing for fifteen minutes and at 7:45 Rev. I. J. Lansing will give an account of the national convention held at Minneapolis in July. The societies of Sutton and Westboro have accepted invitations to the meeting.

Y. M. C. A.

All the arrangements for the annual course of entertainments were completed last week. The expense to the Association for the course will be greater than ever before as the very best talent has been secured. There is not a single entertainment which is not in itself an excellent attraction. The dates are as follows:—

Oct. 29, Boston Symphony Orchestral Club. Nov. 5, Dudley Buck Male Quartet and Mrs. Priest, reader.

Nov. 19, Delphia Concert Company which includes J. C. Bartlett, tenor and Mrs. Gertrude Evans, contralto.

Dec. 3, Fred Emerson Brooks, the poet humorist of California.

Dec. 17, Herbert Johnson, tenor, and the famous Whitney family of New York, in a concert.

Dec. 31, Boy's choir from Boston will render a popular program.

Jan. 21, Fadette Ladies Orchestral Club. Jan. 28, Eli Perkins will lecture on "Philosophy of Wit: How to cause laughter." Mr. Perkins is one of the most popular humorous lecturers in the country.

Feb. 11, Tufts College Glee Club. Said to be the finest college glee club in the country.

Feb. 25, Leland T. Powers will give his new reading of "Sbaughran."

March 3, Vitale Concert Company of New York including Vitale, the great violinist, Miss Bertha Sillsbury, cornet soloist, Miss Crocker, soprano and Robertson in his bell and tumbler solos.

March 10, Mr. and Mrs. Southwick will give an evening of readings.

The tickets will be on sale early and the prices will be the same as usual.

A preliminary entertainment, not belonging to the regular course, will be given October 15, by the Ideal Concert Company of this city.

In the personal item concerning F. L. Emory read mechanical engineering instead of manual training in the West Virginia University.

Mhe Worcester Athletic Club's members handicap games which were announced for today will be postponed until next Saturday and will be combined with the games of that date. Entries for the events will remain open until midnight today.

I heard an amusing conversation between two Texas merchants yesterday. One of them had white hair and black mustache and the other vice versa. "This is strange!" said he of the white mustache "how do you account for it?" "Without any difficulty," was the rejoinder. "You are always using your mouth and I my brain." Spectator.

Mrs. Annie Besant is a sister-in-law of Walter Besant, having married (in 1867, when she was twenty years old) a brother of the novelist.

CHURCH CHOIRS.

CHURCH OF THE UNITY.

The following program of music has been prepared for tomorrow morning: Male quartet. "It is the Lord's Own Day," Alt; double quartet, "There is a River," 46 Psalm, Dudley Buck; response for male voices, "Father, Hear Thy Children," Barnby; soprano solo, "Lovely Appear," "The Redemption." This will probably be the last appearance of Miss E. C. Nason in this city for she leaves soon for Philadelphia where she is to sing in a church. She will be assisted tomorrow by Mrs. Seth Richards, John N. Morse Jr., and George L. Sanborn.

SALEM STREET CONGREGATIONAL.

Thursday evening B. D. Allen received a visit from his choir, who came to welcome him on his return from his vacation trip to the west. They brought with them a handsome easy chair and a table. Music and refreshments helped to make their stay pleasant.

METHODIST.

Grace:—Mrs. L. W. Briggs sang the solo of the response, and Miss Lillie A. Hanson of the anthem, last Sunday morning.

A Popular Steamboat Agent takes a Partner.

Mr. J. F. Spinney, Boston agent of the Yarmouth (N. S.) Steamboat Company, and Miss Florence E., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Johnson, were united in marriage at noon on Wednesday the 9th inst. at the New South Church on Tremont St., Rev. George H. Young officiating. Mr. H. J. Allen gave the bride away, and Mr. J. J. Smith acted as best man. After the ceremony a reception was held at the residence of the brides' parents on Elder St., Dorchester. Prominent among the wedding gifts was a royal silver service and salver from Capt. Forbes and officers on the steamer "Boston." Immediately after the reception, which was largely attended, Mr. and Mrs. Spinney departed on an extended tour.

Ancient Jokes.

Wendell Phillips said that all the jokes ever made could be reduced to forty. Looking through a magazine just one hundred years old I remark the similarity of wit then and now. Here are two or three specimens:—

"A farmer on his death bed, advised his wife to marry, man John. "Dear Husband, says she, "it has been agreed upon long since."

And this, "A tradesman of Windham, Connecticut, having occasion to boil a number of Calves' feet threw the bones at the back of the Court House, an Attorney asked, what bones they were? A bystander replied that he believed them to be Client's bones as they were well picked."

A French priest, who had usually a small congregation, was one day preaching at a church in his village, when, the door being open, a gander and several geese came stalking up the middle aisle. The preacher, availing himself of the circumstance, observed that he could no longer find fault with the people of his district for nonattendance, because, though they did not come themselves, they sent their representatives.

Miss Flora A. Simmons, W. H. S. '91, starts for Vassar next Tuesday.

Edward F. Coffin goes down to Wesleyan Monday next. Charles W. Delano goes also. He will be a sophomore.

Lewis T. Reed returns to Amherst Tuesday next.

Millbury.

The town library is open again after the summer vacation.

A Miss Norton spoke at the 2nd Congregational Church Wednesday evening on mission work in China.

Millbury horses are becoming fractious, there being a runaway on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday of this week.

Labor Day passed very quietly in the rain although there was a Drum Corps on parade.

The Ball games to have been played on Saturday and Monday were postponed because of the storm.

There was a stereopticon exhibition in Blanchard hall on Tuesday evening.

Mr. Lillis of Natick, succeeded H. H. Allen in the Union Grammar School.

Millbury is fully and ably represented at Worcester Academy this fall by: Herman, Hopkins, Charles Park, Charles Chase, Ralph Sweetser, Bion Howard, Arthur Percival, C. D. Cook, True Vanlestrand, Lyman Aldrich, Frank Davis, Eugene Deane, Asa, Edwin and Gilbert Grosvenor, Will Nield, Harry and Eddie Hull and Waldo Tourtellotte.

Rev. Joseph Candlin of Cochituate will preach in the M. E., Church Sunday in exchange with Rev. H. G. Buckingham.

E. J. Deane recently took the Civil service examination for clerkship at the Worcester Post Office taking second rank, his percentage being 89.73 in a list of seventeen.

Prof. Grosvenor will spend the winter in Asia Minor.

Positively the last Excursion to Newport this season via Norwich and the City of Worcester will take place Sept. 18 only $1.75. Round Trip Tickets and Staterooms at, G. V. LANCASTER'S C. P. A., 434 Main St. opp. Front St. Worcester, Mass.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

PROBATE COURT

To the Heirs at law, next of kin, and all other persons interested in the estate of ELI V. A. MIRNICK, late of Princeton, in said county, deceased, Greeting.

Upon the petition of Moses H. Mirnick and Lucinda Mirnick you are hereby cited to appear at a Probate Court, to be held at Worcester, in said County, on the first Tuesday of October next, at nine o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause, if any you have, why an instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of said deceased should not be approved. And the said petitioners are ordered to serve this citation, by publishing the same once a week, three weeks successively, in THE REGISTER, a newspaper printed at Worcester, the last publication to be two days at least, before said court, and to send, or cause to be sent, a written or printed copy of this notice, properly mailed, postage prepaid, to each of the heirs, devisees, or legatees of said estate, or their legal representatives known to the petitioners, seven days, at least, before said Court. Witness, William J. Forbes, Esquire, Judge of said Court, this tenth day of September in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one. F. W. SQUIDWICK, Register.

In the Calm of Evening Time.

At my window now I'm dreaming,
In the calm of evening time,
While the stars above are twinkling
With their melody of rhyme.

Dazed with dreams to bright for paper
Wrapped in songs too sweet to hear—
Wonder not they're lost in vapor,
Ere I come to place them here.

Though I yield with true submission,
And my mind is free to write,
Still to echo turns my missive
For my song has taken flight.

The richest widow in America is Mr. Marshall O. Roberts, of New York city. She is still young—at least, not old—and is a handsome woman, with dark-blue eyes and golden hair. Mrs. Roberts was a New England girl, Miss Suzanne Endicott, and had a thorough New England training in all household arts. She is quite capable of going into the kitchen and cooking a sumptuous dinner, without assistance. She has one child, a boy of twelve.

Helen Gladstone is thought to resemble her father in appearance, and she also possesses his remarkable vitality. At Newnham College she invariably keeps her table in the best of spirits by her amusing stories and witty re-partees. For ordinary society regulations she has little respect, and is quite indifferent about her dress, appearing at luncheons and dinner parties in plain, sensible-looking costumes, in which very little taste is displayed. She is however, a social favorite.

Wheeler—Foster.

At All Saints Church, last Wednesday evening by the Rev. A. H. Vinton, D. D., were united in marriage Mr. Charles D. Wheeler, son of Mrs. Dr. George Chandler, and Miss Fanny Louise Foster, daughter of Mr. Charles Foster of Chestnut Street. Fully eight hundred people were present at the ceremony which was followed by an elaborate reception at the bride's home.

Augustus Duryea, of Brooklyn, N. Y., officiated as best man. Miss Mabel C. Gage was maid of honor. The ushers were George T. Dewey, Paul Ransom of Buffalo, N. Y.;

Miss Grace Carey of New York, Miss Mattie Wetherbee of Boston, Miss Helen Lincoln,
Miss Fannie Wheeler, Miss Sarah J. Hill and Miss Mattie Wheeler. The bride was attired in a dress of white silk and wore a full veil.

At 9:15 p. m. the newly wedded couple started on a wedding trip. Mr. Wheeler who is a graduate of Williams College, is now in his last year at the Harvard Medical School.
After graduation he will travel abroad with Thoughts.

Like mountain streams that ripple along,
Joyously singing their own sweet song,
So should our thoughts, ever willingly tend,
Till in Thy likeness our virtues blend.

Like mountain slopes where sunny light
Breaks forth in visions from the night,
So should the heart reposing rest,
In silence yield at heaven's best,

Like mountain peaks that upward rise,
Hiding their crests neath azure skies
So may our inmost thoughts ascend,
Till in Thy likeness they shall blend.

CHAPTER V.

After the re-construction of the Committee its first and most important duty as well as the most difficult will be the selection and election of a superintendent.

The importance of this office can hardly be over-estimated, though that of the official easily may be:—and the interests at stake have become so great, and the demands for reform are so imperative, that no second-rate man can henceforth be entrusted with the duties of the position without great discredit to himself and serious detriment to the public schools.

In prescribing the duties of superintendent it should not be required of him that he should be a merely ornamental personage, to be foremost on every public occasion, whether scholastic, civic, or military—and always conspicuous on the platform in his best clothes:—but if long-established precedent has rendered this function a necessary part of his duty, it would be a wise economy to hire "a double," as Dr. Hale did:—there might readily be found some burly, well-dressed citizen to grace the platform on these occasions while the real superintendent would be left free to attend to his legitimate duties, which in the new order of things should fully employ all his time and all his powers even if, as is hoped, they may be of the highest order.

The person to whom this high office, with its many delicate duties is to be confided must be a scholar in the highest and broadest meaning of the term:—"it is not enough" that he may have passed four years in the routine studies of some second or third rate college, and even been decorated with an honorary degree.

But he must have had a thorough classical training in the highest institutions of the land, and must be fully imbued with that very flower of culture that characterises the scholar and the gentleman. It goes without saying that he should be a scholar; and he should equally be a gentleman in the truest sense—a gentleman to all the committee and to all the teachers, and a very gentle friend in his contact with the children of the schools—of such a kind and sympathetic temper that his visits to the schools, instead of being dreaded or ridiculed, should be looked forward to with delight as those of a valued counsellor. And he should receive the children at his office as though they had a right there, and not treat them as troublesome intruders.

Nor are these qualities alone sufficient:—he should be deeply impressed with the moral responsibilities of his great office:—he should have in his disposition that love of his race which we call philanthropy, and which St. Paul defines as charity, without which the man is "as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal;" that "charity or love which envieth not; which vaunteth not itself—is not puffed up—doth not behave itself unseemly; rejoiceth not in iniquity but rejoiceth in the truth;—remembering that to him of all men is committed 'the cure of souls.'"

It may not be easy to find at once the man who will fulfill all the requirements of the position, but with the benefit of the experience of that great educator, Dr. Stanley Hall, and his extensive acquaintance among the foremost educators of the world it not be an impossible task to procure a competent person for the place:—at any rate before any true progress can be made this must be done; for it is very clear, and every day made more so, that there must be a resolution, before there can be any effective evolution of a better system

The Real and the Ideal.

THE REAL.—John Smith was arraigned in the Jefferson Market Police Court yesterday morning on charge of intoxication.

"You were drunk," said His Honor.

"I can't deny it," said the prisoner.

"I will have to fine you $10," said the Court.

"All right, boss," said the prisoner.

THE IDEAL.—A gentleman rejoicing in the cognomen of John Smith was placed in the uncomfortable attitude of a defendant before the bar of the temple of justice called the Jefferson Market Police Court. The allegation against the prisoner was that of a too copious indulgence in that beverage which, while it cheers, does also tremendously inebriate.

"You were suffering from a severe attack of dipsomania," asserted the conservator of justice.

"It is not in the nature of things for me to successfully combat the asseveration," responded the gentleman in durance vile.

"It becomes the bounden duty of one occupying the position of arbitrator in cases where matters pertaining to the right and wrong are controverted, to impose upon you pecuniary penalty, and you will therefore be required to add to the revenues of the metropolis in the sum of $10."

"The decision of the just meet even with the approval of those who feel their force," remarked the captive.

SCHOOL SUITS.

The boys are in school once more. It was hard, we know, but after a week or two school pleasures will take the place of those you have had all summer, and the boys will have just as good a time.

Boys want a better Suit of Clothes in the city and at school than they did out of school with nothing on earth to do but to play from morning till night.

We have a Suit that we know will please ever so many,
Because it is Good,

Because it is Stylish,

Because it is well made,

And will stand all sorts of hard uses and besides there is the very important consideration that

It Costs Only $5.

It is a splendid Suit for that money, and no boy need be ashamed to wear one.
KNOCKABOUT $5 SUITS.

When the boys grow a little larger, they want a whole Suit as near like a man's as possible. If they are compelled to wear "KNEE PANTS" they are even as determined to have a VEST, and so for them we have the very nicest and best Suits,

With Jackets,

With Vests,

With Knee Pants.

"All the fellows have Vests nowadays," said one little man the other day, and he went off happy as a prince with his handsome JACKET, VEST and KNEE PANTS, for which he paid $5-50.

We wish the boys could see the "stacks of 'em" that are here to select from.

Why you are sure to be suited, and your folks are sure to be suited, for although they have a right to get what you want at the least cost, yet they always want GOOD CLOTHES FOR YOU, and something that is durable and yet looks stylish and nice.

We Have that Very Kind,

And we know you will come here for them

This Heater is unsurpassed for excellence of workmanship and is the best in the market. Now is the time to secure estimates. The following is one of a great number of testimonials from our leading citizens:

WORCESTER, MASS., APRIL 1, 1890.

THE ROYAL STEAM HEATER CO.
Gentlemen:—Having purchased two of your Heaters, one now in use three years, the other 2 years, I can safely say we could hardly keep house without one. I would rather take care of my Heater with 15 radiators attached than one parlor stove where I had to bring coal and carry away the ashes. Anyone intending to heat by steam should examine the Royal and note the working of the Grate, which I think is far ahead of any I have ever seen. I will gladly give information to intending purchasers. Respectfully yours F. E. BARNARD.

Look at this picture and read.

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a house-keeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility.

One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1891.

No. 3

"Make your home beautiful—bring to it flowers;
Plant them around you to bud and to bloom;
Let them give light to your loneliest hours,
Let them give light to even your gloom."

The homes of a nation are its bulwarks.

Everything that adds to the comfort and pleasure of home, contributes to the national well being.

Few people leave really happy homes for the allurements of the saloon or of any other place where vice is propagated.

From its start, LIGHT has aimed to make itself a necessity in Worcester homes, believing that the home circle is the starting place of all that is good in man.

From the happy homes, come light hearts and cheerful faces. Many agencies enter into the making of really pleasant homes. First of all love and agreement must be there. Nellie Pitts in her dry goods box hovel, sure of her husband's love, was content; while many a brown stone palace confines hearts that are well nigh bleeding.

LIGHT would have homes brighter and better in every way; better styles of houses, less crowded, with ample surroundings that the little ones may run and romp, climb and dig and yet not trespass. LIGHT would have the interiors so constituted that woman's life might be less a constant warfare against dust and moths.

Next comes the school. From the home, the little one passes to the school and that school is best that is most like a good home. LIGHT favors any school, public or private, whose aim is the making of good citizens, that looks beyond the conning of certain text book matter to what must be done in life, believing always that that teacher is the best who is American reared and whose heart exults in the memories of American excellence and who will spare no pains to make his pupils upright, industrious American citizens, irrespective of color or creed.

LIGHT cares not how much time a man may have given to preparing himself for the vocation of teacher, if he be not pure as the snow, as free from reproach as Caesar's wife, he has no place in the school. Knowledge imparted, will be no compensation for the least fault warranted by habit or custom on the teachers part. Solomon's wisdom coupled with Solomon's faults will not do for the best American schools. As well might a bat come out into the full glare of a noontide sun and try to teach young larks to fly as for some of the imported, alleged teachers to undertake to train young Americans.

And then country! From home to school and through that into the broader field of devotion to fatherland. Our homes and schools should rear men and women who will deem no sacrifice too great that will contribute to the country's good. We want no namby pamby dilettante who smiles derisively at love of country as though it were a weakness of the lower class, the common herd. As for him, the world is his country. America first, the rest of the world afterwards. George Howland of Chicago Americanized the schools of that city and there was need enough of it.

The famous broth, brewed by the witches in Macbeth, was not more composite than are the elements which enter into America's people. If they were originally made of one blood, that liquid has run through such devious and divergent channels that, today, we are disposed to view with suspicion, almost, the statement. To produce some of the alleged humanity that seeks our shores, it would seem that an original and special creation were necessary. However, they are here, and here to stay. We must make them over into American citizens, into men and women whose blood will tingle at the mention of Bunker Hill and Yorktown and when Vicksburg and Gettysburg are named they must be ready to go and do likewise if need be.

To make them thus, our schools must be taught by God fearing, country loving teachers, men and women who realize the value of our liberty, beings to whom their vocations is not merely a "job" to be prepared for as the apprentice learns to make a boot. No amount of book attainments can fit some people for this high calling. Parents must see to it that their hearths are bright. Catiline's warning, "Look to your hearths, my Lords!" is as pertinent now as ever. Upon home and school depends the future of our country. As they are, so will our future be. So then we nail our flag to the mast head and let it float for HOME, SCHOOL AND COUNTRY.

Apropos of Rebellion matters, the late refusal of the Georgia Legislature to maintain the Confederate Soldiers' Home, erected by the lamented Grady is a startling comment on affairs. The same body is considering the giving of $400,000 to soldiers' widows. There is not a veteran in the North who will not regret the refusal. Our old opponents need care in their crippled age. From the nature of things, it does not come upon the general government to help; but Georgia has a chance to supplement Grady's gift. Let us hope that the Farmers Alliance Legislature will see the matter in a different light before the adjournment of that body.

In 1895, we are to have the bi-centennial of the famous Salem witchcraft horrors. Provisionally or otherwise, Gallows Hill is still bare and bleak. If the many thousands of living descendants of the nineteen victims perishing there should contribute a dollar each, a monument of towering proportions might be reared upon which might be chiseled in imperishable characters the names of those slain. Worcester has many residents who can trace their ancestral line to the sad scenes on that terrible hill. The data brought out by such tracing would be of great utility in a genealogical way. LIGHT calls for an expression of opinion on the subject, standing ready to offer a dollar for the memory of Martha Carrier who was of Andover, but unjustly accused, perished with others in those infamous days.

Several Worcester Athletic Club men took part in the Y. M. C. A. handicap games at Fall River last Saturday with the following result. W. H. Allison, scratch man in the mile run won the event in 4 minutes 53 seconds. His nearest competitor had a handicap of 110 yards. Vernon Mowry, who had a handicap of 5 yards in the 100 yards dash won the final heat in 10 seconds. He also finished second in the quarter-mile. In this he had 20 yards handicap. J. H. Adams reached the semifinals in the 100 yards dash, but was beaten there. Brennan competed in the hop, step and jump and the pole vault but failed to win a place.

Last week was one of the most important of the year to the bicyclers, for it included the Hartford and Springfield meetings, the former taking place Tuesday and Wednesday and the latter Thursday and Friday. At the Hartford races there were a number of new records made. Zimmerman, of the New York A. C., with a flying start, covered a quarter mile in 29 4/5 seconds, beating Windle's world's record for that distance, 30 1/5 seconds. Berlo of the Manhattan A. C. made a new record for a quarter-mile with a standing start. His time was 33 3/5 seconds. Zimmerman also did the same thing later.

During the races Wednesday, A. B. Rich won the two mile event in 5 minutes 11 1/5 seconds. The morning papers of the following day stated that this made a new world's record which is not correct, unless the recent report that G. Minturn Worden of the Manhattan A. C. did the distance in 5 minutes 6 4/5 seconds is untrue. Just at present it is very difficult to tell what the world's records are, they are being broken so frequently. Wednesday also, Worden and J. W. Scherer of the Manhattan A. C. equalled Zimmerman's quarter mile, flying start, record, made the day before and Banker and Bunker made a new mile tandem safety record, 2 minutes, 30 4/5 seconds.

The Springfield races were not as remarkable for record breaking as had been expected. The time in the world's record one mile safety was particularly disappointing, though it was a wonderful race. Zimmerman was the hero of the first day. He won the mile ordinary open, the one-half-mile ordinary open, the quarter-mile safety flying start and the one-half-mile safety handicap. In this last event he beat the world's record of 1 minute, 8 3/5 seconds, made recently by Berlo, by doing the distance in 1 minute 6 4/5 seconds. Friday was the great day of the meeting and the mile-safety, world's record race was the great event of the day. By winning this race Windle, the Millbury boy, established beyond all question his right to the title of champion of American riders. The race was disappointing in regard to the time and resulted in a disagreement between the spectators and the referee. Just before the race the referee, W. S. Bull announced that the time limit would be 2 minutes 23 2/5 seconds and stated that if the winner failed to equal that time he would order the first four men who crossed the tape to race over again. Nothing was said however about the rule which allows the referee to set aside the time limit if he considered the race to have been fairly completed. The race was divided into three trial heats and a final. The starters in the final were Graves, Hoyland, Smith, Berlo, Rich, Worden, Windle, Zimmerman, Taylor, McDuffee, Murphy and Dorntge. Taylor reached the quarter first, winning the 50 diamond pin offered for the leader at that point. He was also first at the half, winning another diamond pin. Dorntge won the remaining diamond pin by leading at the three quarters. On the last turn the order was as follows: Murphy, Berlo, Zimmerman, Rich, Windle with the field behind. Twenty yards from the finish the order was the same, save that Windle, was abreast Berlo. Ten yards from the tape Berlo lead slightly. At the finish, Windle lead Berlo by half a length while Murphy and Zimmerman were close behind.

The time was announced as 2 minutes, 23 3/5 seconds. As this is outside the time limit the four leaders were recalled for a second trial but the referee declared that he was satisfied that the riders had done their best and so Windle was announced as the winner. The crowd didn't like this as the majority of them had hoped that Zimmerman would win and they thought that perhaps he might if there was another trial.

Our city clerk, Enoch H. Town, was elected, Wednesday, a member of the executive committee of the State Association of City Clerks.

Col. H. B. Very, of the governor's staff, is visiting the county fairs with him.

Frank S. C. Wicks, formerly of The Telegram, is to study for the Unitarian ministry. He left his home in this city, Wednesday, to go to Peekskill, N. Y. After a week's stay there he will go to Meadville, Pa., to begin a three years' course of study at the Meadville Theological Seminary.

School and College.

High School.

After arranging and classifying the students, there comes the actual application to duty. To the more than nine hundred pupils here, this has become a reality.

Some delay was experienced in arranging some of the classes, owing to the non-arrival of text books. The books were ordered early in June, but through a misunderstanding did not arrive until Monday, thus depriving the pupils of a few days work. Did they mourn? Not they, but the teachers.

Anything to break the monotony of school life is always welcomed by the pupils, but the pupils of room 11 were much surprised the other day when one of the young ladies came into school wearing—what do you suppose—a dainty pair of blue suspenders. It was indeed novel. The writer was informed that it was the latest from Worth but the reader can take it for what it is worth. The exquisite blue of the suspenders contrasted well however with the spotless white dress under them.

While speaking of the young ladies let me tell you a little joke that happened in room seven the other day. One of the teachers seemed to have something upon his mind. One of the young ladies perceived this, and asked the scholar beside her if he knew what was the matter? He replied in the negative, whereupon the young lady replied that she thought he (the teacher) was "mellen" choly. To friends of the school this will be suggestive.

A few suggestions right here I hope will not be out of place. First, now that the school has opened, let every one who has any ambition and energy do his best. There is only one time to go to school and acquire an education and that is in youth. And what better place is there than here, in a school ranked among the finest, with many able and interested teachers and such a kind and pleasant principal. Second—Don't waste your time in idle day dreaming, but follow Longfellow who says—

Let us then be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate,
Still achieving still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.

Have, moreover, noble resolutions for the coming year and whatever you do, whether you be in school or out, enter into it with your whole heart and soul.

How kindly did Dr. Wight welcome the School as they assembled in the hall for the first time last Thursday morning. There was no doubting his words when he said that he was glad to see them all back again.

Whenever pupils leave the school to pursue studies in higher institutions it is always welcome news to their friends. I have to record this week the names of seven young ladies who have entered the State Normal School at Framingham. All of them were bright energetic girls while with us. May they be an honor to the school to which they have gone. Their names are:—Miss Anna Curtis, Ada Carter, Myra Thayer, Edna Thayer, Elizabeth H. M. Boyd, class of '91; Carrie Stockwell, class of '93; Marion Blenus, class of '90.

This year the school is to have that most eminent of poets, Oliver Wendell Holmes, as a study in Rhetoricals the first half of the year. The first exercises will occur in the hall next Tuesday morning, the first two hours.

A change has been made in the matter of text books in Rhetoric. In place of Kellogg's Text book, Williams' Composition and Rhetoric by Practice, has been substituted. The new book has many advantages over the old, principally in the fact that the work is almost entirely in exercises. The author is also the editor of a new edition of Goldsmith's "Deserted Village."

It was a musical company that Prof. Seth Richards met, as he stepped upon the platform last Monday morning. The drill was principally upon chanting the Lords Prayer. By the way, what better instruction could any of the teachers give to those under them. A few minutes spent upon it every Monday would not come amiss both as regards the morning exercise and the moral effect also.

What a stalwart set of pupils the senior class is. This band, composed of the best stock the school can support. How the first year pupils look up to them. They have a respect for the seniors verging upon reverence. How proud the young men are! They walk about the building, hands under their arms, their manner seeming to say "I am lord of all I survey." Yet they are not haughty, but are a most loving and lovable set of boys: would that the world were made up of just such kind hearted boys as these. It was to be sure quite a punishment for a senior boy to be obliged to combine mental and physical forces in school, but such is the case with a few boys in Room 7 who are obliged to prepare the blackboards each day for use. They do it no doubt with a sense of love for the teacher. I hope so.

The Debating Clubs as in years before have started off admirably, a good deal of campaigning was done in obtaining new members for the several societies and I understand that a goodly number were obtained. The girls do not, as a general thing, conduct as systematic campaigns as the boys, yet the Altheia opened its meetings in an interesting manner last Friday. The following was the full report of the meeting: Vocal Solo, Miss Chapin; Reading, Miss Keith; Piano Duo, Misses Gate and Morse.

Question—Resolved, that the president of the United States should be elected by a popular vote. Decided in the affirmative.

It was debated in the affirmative by Messrs Perry and Barnard and ably sustained in the negative by Misses Hale and Keith. It was decided in the affirmative.

The critic for the meeting was Miss Howard, and Miss Darling presided over the meeting. It goes without saying that she was a—darling.

The Sumner Club which has usually been the foremost among the clubs, does not seem to have the life and energy so essential to a powerful assembly. Yet the few men present did well. Mr. C. A. Andrews, whose name appears upon the following report, is what may be termed a horn orator. He has a fine voice and a forcible delivery and prepares his debate so logically that he is able even to win his opponent. The club has in him an able secretary. The following report was carried out at the meeting of the club last Friday night—

Declamation, "Battle of Bunker Hill," Dwight G. Burrage; Paper, "Roman Education," E. W. Goodell; Reading, "Spiritualism" O. C. White.

Question—Resolved, that Greece has done more for the world than Rome. Affirmative:—George A. Collic, Walter L. Sprague, Henry H. Hill; Negative—Frank E. Gilbert, J. F. Monroe, Chas. E. Andrews. critic, George K. Bliss.

When thrown open to the house, the question was debated in the affirmative by W. L. Sprague and F. W. Goodell and in the negative by C. E. Andrews and F. E. Gilbert, D. G. Burrage. The question was finally decided in the negative.

The Assembly had by far the largest attendance and most spirited meeting of any of the clubs. Although not much was heard about it last year, it seems to have suddenly come to life. The report of the evening follows:—

Declamation, "The Life Boat," H. K. Larkin. Extemporaneous address on the question, "Resolved, that all public men should be salaried," by G. W. Field.

Paper—"The Railway and Ocean Travel of the present day," H. L. Bellisle.

Reading—"College Farming," A. E. Denny.

Question—Resolved, that it is necessary for the stability of the United States that the country should be composed of self-governing states.

After having been debated in the affirmative by Messrs. J. F. McGrail and N. B. Hale, and in the negative by G. W. Matthews, G. H. Ellinwood and H. L. Bellisle, it was finally decided in the negative.

The Euclidea held its meeting in Room 11, their old home, with a fair attendance. The programme: Declamation, C. F. Leonard; Declamation, W. J. Foran; Reading, C. E. Dowd; Question, Resolved—That the late revolution in Chili was for the best interest of that country. Affirmative, P. J. McLaughlin, F. J. Garvey, J. A. Tierney. Negative, H. J. Murray, J. Gannon, C. F. Leonard. The question was finally decided in the affirmative by a large vote.

Speaking of the clubs, it may be well to add that there is some fine stock in all the clubs, but hardly enough to successfully carry on four separate clubs. A movement is on foot among the boys by which a new club can be formed. The result of this move will be eagerly awaited by all. G. T. W.

Notes.

Mrs. Brigham's Senior French Classes as a part of the year's work, will render Dickinson's "Christmas Carol" into French.

The first meeting of the Glee Club will be held the first Monday in October.

Mr. Harry Banfield, who spent last year studying dentistry in Boston, is back in school pursuing a special course.

Mr. Hector Bellisle will preside at the piano during devotional exercise in the hall the coming year.

Mr. Wight mentioned with much pride the other morning, in the hall, the fact that never had he had occasion to speak of conduct from that platform.

The City Guards.

Fifty-one years is a long period of time. Birth-days are noteworthy whether of individuals or nations, and to make merry on their return is common. This, 19th of September, is the natal day of the Worcester City Guards. To be sure the celebration does not come till next Thursday, but by telling their story now, we shall be in ample time for the fête day.

In 1887, when a fair was given by the Guards in Mechanics Hall, a paper, called the Citizen Soldier was issued and in it, one of the original members, Lt. Samuel Hathaway, now of Thompsonville, Conn., gave a very concise sketch of the company which is appended here in full:

Recollections of a Veteran.

During the political excitement of 1840 the Worcester Light Infantry, then composed of Whigs and Democrats, found it too hot to remain united, and split up, all the Whig members withdrawing, excepting Captain D. Waldo Lincoln, then in command, who remained at their head in spite of all opposition, for years. The Whig portion set to work to form a new company and in the excitement of the community soon had on their roll the names of sixty-four prominent young men of the town. The question of calling the Company "The Worcester Harrison Independent Guards," so that the initials would spell "whig" on the knapsack, was discussed, but was abandoned from its great length, and the name "The Worcester Guards" was adopted, which was changed in 1850, by vote of the company, to "The Worcester City Guards."

The first officers were:—Captain, George Bowen, 1st Lieut. George Hobbs, 2d Lieut. Leonard Pool, 3d Lieut. George W. Richardson, 1st Sergt. and Clerk, Herman Gould, 2d, Joshua K. Bigelow, 3d, Samuel T. Lamb, 4th, Elbridge G. Pratt, 5th and Color Bearer, Charles Blanchard. An organization was effected Sept. 19, 1840, and the Company paraded for the first time on that day, and sixty-four "good men and true" stood in line before the Town Hall while the Boston Brigade Band sounded off, and old Bartlett's trumpet sounded the notes of their first retreat (may it echo down the ages). This ceremony began the history that for nearly half a century has been written in honor without one stain to mar its beauty, or one blot on its escutcheon of glory. From the time of its organization to the present the Company has been commanded by the following officers in the ordered name:—

Capt. George Bowen, Capt. George Hobbs, Capt. Leonard Pool, Capt. George B. Conklin, Capt. L. Lincoln Newton, Capt. Edwin Eaton, Capt. Charles W. Longley, Capt. John M. Goodhue, Capt. George H. Ward, Capt. A. B. R. Sprague, Capt. R. H. Chamberlain, Capt. Joseph A. Titus, Capt. Wm. H. King, Capt. E. K. Shumway, Capt. George H. Cleveland and Capt. Wm. D. Preston.

The Company has occupied armories as follows:—

First, in the second story of the Town Hall. Second, in the third story of a wooden building on Thomas St., near Slater Court. Third, in the attic of Dr. Greene's building where the Five Cents Savings Bank is now located. Fourth, Waldo Block.

When the Worcester Bank Block was built an armory was furnished for the Guards, which, at the time, was one of the best in the State, and became a popular resort for the Company and its friends. Afterwards Brinley Hall was leased by the Company for an armory and used by them until the opening of the War. When Brinley Hall was abandoned, the upper story of Taylor's Block was fitted for an armory, which was destroyed by fire in 1875.

The armory on Waldo Street, built by the City, was at that time nearly completed, and was soon afterward occupied by the Company in common with the other military organizations of the City. The armory on Waldo Street, although built in accordance with approved plans, was never satisfactory, it being three times condemned by the Adjutant General, but it was not until July, 1885, that it was abandoned, when the Company moved to Clark's Block on Front St, where they remained until the beginning of the present year (1887) when they moved into the quarters which they now occupy.

The first encampment of the Company, in 1840, was in Worcester. The second was in West Boylston, when the band was accompanied by Ned Kendall with his silver bugle, and he and his brother Jim became great favorites with the Company, and gave a famous concert in Worcester for the Guards, Old Put and Si Smith furnished the field music, with file and drum, for many years. Dar Simpson, the veteran drummer of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery following after Old Put, had beat his last "taps." At the West Boylston encampment the Company was detached to exhibit the drill in Scott's Tactics, then just adopted by the M. V. M., to the Field Officers, Brigadier General Jones of Greenfield in command.

When Captain Goodhue assumed command of the Company they were at rather a low ebb, there being but twenty-four men on the roll, and their property consisted of three old tents bought of the Sterling Company, and a cap and jacket for each man. But when he left them three years later they had sixty odd men, and property to the amount of several hundred dollars; and stood at the head of the M. V. M., in drill and discipline. In 1851 a new uniform was procured, of white cloth and red facings, with bear skin caps, and side-hangers with black belts. A contribution of $400 was received from the citizens for the hangers and belts, each member paying for his own uniform. A picture of the Company, drawn up in line before the Central Exchange on their first parade in their new uniforms is in existence at the armory, and is much prized by the Company. A beautiful oil painting of the encampment (?) at South Worcester by Henry Woodward, Esq., adorned the walls of the armory for many years, but was destroyed, together with the records and other valuable mementoes in the fire at Taylor's Block.

The Company attended the celebration of the dedication of Bunker Hill Monument, and was detached to do guard duty at the Monument while Daniel Webster delivered his great oration.

In 1860 the past members of the Company received an elegant gold medal, which they presented to the Company to be shot for annually. It is still in existence, and bears the name of every man who has ever won and worn it. It is at present (1887) held by Sergeant M. H. Tisdell.

It would take many columns to properly relate the history of the Company, so replete with stirring events, the above only being intended as a brief synopsis of the earlier history of the Company. The war record of the Company, which has not here been noted, will be found in another column; and in conclusion it will suffice to state that from the time of its organization to the present, the Company has always maintained a high standing in the militia of the State, and that the discipline and personel was never better than at present.

The City Guards in the Rebellion.

"Early in the spring of 1861 the Worcester City Guards were without a captain, Lieut. Edwin A. Wood, commanding. About forty names werebourne upon the roll.

When the militia was called to active service. A. B. R. Sprague, an old Guard, then Brigade Major of the Fifth Brigade was unanimously elected captain, and assumed command on the 17th day of April. The ranks were promptly filled, and many applicants for membership failed to secure admission.

2d Lieut. Josiah Pickett was elected 1st Lieut.; George C. Joslin, 2d Lieut.; Orson Moulton, 3d Lieut.; Elisha A. Harkness 4th Lieut.

On the 18th day of April, Capt. Sprague was ordered to muster forthwith the company for active service, and on the 20th left the State as a part of the 3d. Batt. Rifles, Major Charles Devens, Jr., commanding.

The partial destruction of railroad bridges between Baltimore and Havre de Grace closed that route to the Capital, and the command embarked at New York on the steamer Ariel, and landed at Annapolis Md., April 24th. On the 30th of May following they reached Fort McHenry to reinforce the garrison, which consisted of only two companies of regular artillery, Major W. W. Morris commanding the Post.

The time was fully occupied in infantry and artillery drill, mounting heavy guns, and expeditions down the Chesapeake. The command suffered much by over-work. During the term they served under Generals Patterson, Banks, Caldwell, Dix and Butler, and were mustered out of service August 3d.

As a company it never again was called into the military service of the United States, but fifty-six of those who again returned, followed the fortunes of the old flag and were represented in fifteen regiments, seven as field officers, five commanding regiments, namely the 15th, 25th and 36th Infantry, and the 2d Heavy Artillery, and furnished line officers for the 21st, 22d, and 34th Massachusetts, 7th Connecticut, 7th Maine, 102d New York, United States Infantry, Ira Harris Cavalry, 1st North Carolina Volunteers and United States Colored Troops.

Among the killed in battle were Captains Shaw, 7th Maine, Bardick, 7th Conn, who fell on the same assault at Fort Wagner, Lieuts. Mathews and Pelton of the 25th Mass, at Cold Harbor, Lieut. Daniels of the 36th Mass. at Spotsylvania, Lieut. Bacon of 102d New York at Chancellorsville.

The company officers entered the volunteer service and were promoted as follows:—

Capt. A. B. R. Sprague to be Lieut. Col. 25th Mass. Vols. Colonel 51st Mass. Colonel 2d Mass. Heavy Artillery, Brig. General United States Volunteer by Brevet.

1st Lieut. Josiah Pickett, Captain, Major and Colonel 25th Mass. Brig. General by Brevet.
2d Lieut. George C. Joslin, Captain, Major and Lieut. Col. 15th Mass.

3d Lieut. Orson Moulton, Captain and Lieut. Col. 25th Mass.

4th Lieut. Elisha A. Harkness, 1st Lieut. and Adjutant 25th Mass. Major 51st Mass.

Nearly 150 men who had sometime carried a musket in the ranks of the City Guards were in the Union Army in the war of the Rebellion, conspicuous among whom were Brig. General John B. Wyman, who fell in command of his Brigade at Vicksburg and Col. George H. Ward, the only colonel of a Massachusetts regiment who fell at Gettysburg.

Of those holding commissions in the great army of volunteers were one Brig. General, three Brig. Generals by Brevet, five Colonels eight Lieut. Colonels, four Majors, about twenty-five Captains and twenty Lieutenants.

Twenty-three were killed or died in the service, and twenty-five others were wounded—seven died in rebel prisons.

They fought in the Department of North Carolina and the Gulf, in the Army of the Potomac, the James, the Shenandoah, the Cumberland and the Ohio.

They were faithful unto death, and left a record without a stain, of which their successors may be justly proud.

To these words of Lieut. ex-Captain Hathaway and the Captain it might be added that, first and last, the Guards have included in their lists some of the best citizens of Worcester. To the original sixty-four must be added several hundred others who have kept step to the drum-beat. Of those men who made up the first roster, Capt. Howen was the father of the lady who became the wife of Major Francis A. Blake. First Lieut. Hobbs rose to be major-general in the militia and gave two sons to the service during the rebellion. Capt. L. L. Newton was a son of Rejoice Newton, and thereby a brother of Mrs. John W. Wetherell. Years ago, S. R. Leland dedicated to him a piece of music, called "Newton Quickstep," and on the title page is a very good picture of the captain, with the company wearing their second uniform, one of blue. General Sprague has a picture taken from Gleason's Pictorial, representing the company in Captain Goddub's day, wearing a white uniform with bearskin hats. These pictures would make fine contrasts with one of the company as it is dressed to-day.

The Kendall referred to as bugler was one of the most noted cornetists of his day, and it was claimed that his famous horn was given to him by Queen Victoria. "Old Put" and "Si" Smith were also distinguished military musicians, Smith, the fiercer, a small man, and "Put," with a foot that made an impression whenever it came down. The General Wyman who was killed in the West married a daughter of the first Osgood Bradley. Owing to the burning of the enlistment books of the company it is difficult to tell, to-day, just who the survivors of the first company are but it is certain that Hon. John C. B. Davis of Washington, ex Insurance Commissioner Julius L. Clark of Boston, Lieut. Samuel Hathaway of Connecticut, David Baker, George A. Brown, Leonard Gates and Harrington of this city were of the number.

Before the civil war, probably the most exciting episode in the company's life was its appearance at the Gabriel Riot, so called. One Orr had so stirred up affairs that he had been arrested and was in the police station, then under the city hall. A throng of people was determined to have him out. The mob would not disperse at the command of Mayor J. S. C. Knowlton. It was May 18, 1854. At 7 P. M. a mass of people armed with paving stones made things lively on Front Street. Marshal Lovell Baker and Sheriff Geo. W. Richardson did their best to secure order, the mayor read the riot act; but the crowd did not budge. Then came the Guards, Capt. Ward with Lieuts. Sprague, Stone, Harkness and Adams, seven non-commissioned officers, with 26 enlisted men. They had been ordered, if they fired at all, to shoot to kill. Ball cartridges had been distributed. The Guards marched rapidly to their places on the south side of Front Street, near the Hall, between 8 and 9 P. M. Still the people did not disperse. Then came the captain's order, "Load with ball cartridge, Load." A participant in the drama says, that "long before the order was executed, and the command 'Fire' could be given, that throng of men melted away. It was unaccountable where they went to. They had no stomach for leaden pills."

At 11 P. M., the city was in its normal condition; but the next day the Guards again reported; but there was no use for them, and they found the best way to withdraw their charges was to go out Jo Bill Road and fire at a target.

The following lists give the lieutenants of the company from the beginning:

The rebellion furnished an opportunity for the Guards to show their mettle and they were proven to be true blue. A competent judge remarks: "I don't believe there was a company of men in the United States that furnished so large a number of officers and men to the general service as did the Worcester City Guards." The following is a partial list of those who served as non-commissioned officers and privates:

THE GUARDS TO-DAY.

Wm. A. Condy, the Captain, was born in Lowell in 1862. In the following year his people came to Worcester, and here his home has been since. He was one of Mr. Hayne's boys at the Washington Street school. He enlisted May 23d, 1882. He was Corporal, Sergeant, 2d Lieut., 1st Lieut., and was commissioned Captain July 19, 1888. From that date to the present he has never missed a drill. He is a machinist by occupation.

First Lieutenant Moses H. Tisdell was born in St. Paul, Canada, Dec. 13, 1856. He enlisted in the Guards October 20th, 1883, and has held all grades of position to his present one, Corp., April 27, 1885; Sergt., Nov. 9, 1885; 1st Sergt., May 23, 1887; 2d Lieut., Nov. 18, 1887; 1st Lieut., July 18, 1888. Lieut. Tisdell is forman of Walker & Brown's finishing room.

Second Lieutenant Edwin G. Barrett is a native of Springfield, where he was born in 1866. He has lived in Worcester fifteen years. He enlisted May 25, 1885. He was successively Corporal, Sergeant, 1st Sergeant, and received his commission July 18, 1888. He is a salesman.

First Sergeant Wm. D. Preston was the captain of four years ago. He was born in Worcester in 1855 and was trained in our public schools, ending in the Thomas Street IX grade, with Mr. E. I. Comins. His first enlistment was Aug. 10, 1880, and he went through all the grades to Captain, with the exception of 1st Lieutenant. Resigning the captaincy in 1888, he was, for a year, Brigade Sergeant Major on the staff of General Briggs; but it is hard for a man of good soldier stuff to keep out of the lines, so in March, 1890, he re-enlisted, and was successively private, corporal, and then 1st sergeant. He is a machinist by trade.

The Roster of the Guards, Co. A, 2d Regt., M. V. M. is:

It should be added that from their Clark

Street quarters, the company went to barracks provided on Mechanic Street, facing Norwich. Thence they moved to their present rooms on the second floor of the new armory. Here their surroundings are almost palatial, and long may they continue to cherish the memories of the past and to provide for future emergencies. The medal given to the best shot in the company is now held by Sergt. John D. Grace, and here is its history: "Presented by the Worcester Guards, 1840, to the Worcester City Guards, Sept. 19, 1860, to be shot for annually."

Though the most of us knew that "Sam" Babbitt was something of a veteran, no one was prepared for the following announcement from Spencer.

"Here Lyes ye Body of U. Abigail Babbitt, ye wife of Mr. Samuel Babbitt, who died Sept. ye 14, 1762, in ye 20th year of her age."

"Sam" says it must have been his first one.

The transferral of some portion of the Washburn & Moen works to the West is to cause the removal of some of our best citizens. Calvin M. Whitcomb and his son, Arthur M., of Lincoln Street, have already gone. They will be greatly missed. When Mrs. W. follows quite a blank will be left in Grace Church circles.

Boys' Club.

This most excellent organization is again open and under Superintendent Burgess' direction is again ready for business. Let every man who wishes his fellows well, "Lend a hand."

Destiny.

BY MARY WOODWARD WEATHERS.

Waiting one time, some oracle to show,
The final outcome of this restless flow
Of life's intermingled peace and pain;
A little brook came purling through the dell
And answered me, oh singularly well.

"What if thine origin and mine's concealed;
Small part of all our pleasant ways revealed,
By dingy ridge, and eddy bay,
We sweep serenely to the foaming sea,
O'er God's depths, love sharpens thee and me.

And if sometimes for sharpness of the stones,
The song we sing, wells up in minor tones,
Or, gliding through the pleasant vale,
We catch the aria of love's refrain;
May it not mingle with heavens' sweeter strain?"

The Minister's Wooing, by Harriet Beecher Stowe, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. In paper 50 cents.

Our publishers, this year, seem disposed to give us no old friends in new apparel. This story is No. 38 in the Riverside Paper Series. By the way, that river on whose side the press is planted is the Charles whose glories this most gifted woman has sung so many times and so sweetly. It was away back in 1859 that The Minister's Wooing ran through the pages of The Atlantic and then appeared in book form. The writer of Uncle Tom's Cabin and Dred was already famous; but here was a step in another direction. It was not political, but it was and is, probably, the best picture of New England home life ever written. Mrs. Stowe received letters of commendation from Archbishop Whately, Rev. Charles Kingsley, Gladstone and of it, James Russell Lowell said, "We do not believe that there is any one who by birth, breeding and natural capacity, has had the opportunity to know New England so well as she, or has the peculiar genius to profit by the knowledge. Already there have been scenes in The Minister's Wooing, that, in their lowliness of tone and quiet truth, contrast as charmingly with the timid vagueness of the modern school of novel-writers as the Vicar of Wakefield itself; and we are greatly mistaken if it does not prove to be the most characteristic of Mrs. Stowe's works, and that on which her fame will chiefly rest with posterity." In this cheap and attractive form, the story ought to have a re-reading by old friends and an introduction to the generation of new ones.

The History of Westborough, Massachusetts, Part I. The Early History by Herman Fackard DeForest. Part II by Edward Craig Bates. Published by the Town, 1891.

The town had done a good work. A book has been produced, that a hundred years hence will rank with Whitney's Worcester County, Draper's Spencer, and Reed's Rutland. It was a happy thought to divide up the work, giving to each writer that which he could do best. Mr. De Forest was once a clergyman in the town and in looking up church matters had incidentally, done a great deal more, hence to him the town turned when the history was decided upon. Judge Bates, from long residence and knowledge, was eminently qualified for an account of later events. Judge Forbes contributes a valuable chapter on Land Grants. The wife of the Judge is already known to many readers as a student of Westborough history in her Hundredth Town, a little book that was very favorably received a few years ago. There is no township in the Commonwealth whose story, well told, does not awaken interest. This of Westborough is exceptionally well told and is correspondingly entertaining. Her limits include territory that has echoed to the Indians war whoop, to the tread of the Revolutionary soldiers and the Rebellion drew a large number of volunteers to the strife against slavery. The chapter devoted to the war record is very full and valuable. While illustrations are not profuse, there are enough to give a very good idea of what the town is and has been. She has elegant residences and well appointed public buildings. She has given birth to many distinguished men and some of these, as Horace Maynard, are depicted in photography. The Committee on Publication have done their work well and have reason to be satisfied with the results. Of the original committee, Chairman Geo. B. Brigham and George Forbes died, and in the latter's place, Mr. Charles S. Henry was appointed. So the committee, at the date of publication, consisted of Joshua E. Beeman and Mr. Henry. Of course the circle in which such a book is read is not a wide one. It is made up chiefly of those who were once residents of the town and those who are now living there, with those omnivours who are charmed with anything in the way of a local history. No town under takes such a publication for the sake of making money, but with such a work, well done, a town may congratulate itself on having served the public well. In the appendix may be found complete lists of all town officers in the past and the votes of the town for Governor to 1890 inclusive. The sketch of the town written by the Rev. Ebenezer Parkman in 1767 is given complete. A very full and exact index closes the volume, thereby rendering all the matter, preceding, accessible. The book itself, is a large octavo of above 500 pages, and is exceedingly well printed at the University Press, Cambridge. Finally, the town of Westborough undertook to make a book that her present and former citizens might be proud of and has succeeded. It may be purchased of the committee in Westborough. $3 50, $4 50 and $6, according to binding. Postage 25 cents extra.

The Signboard and Other Stories, Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York. Kialto Series, No. 37. 50 cents.

Herein have been gathered, along with very brief sketches of the writers, The Signboard by Michael Masson; The Pale Young Man by Emile Souvestre; The Mummy's Foot by Théophile Gautier and The Sufferings of Claude Blouet by André Theuriet. Most excellent selections these are. The first one is the longest and the best. Of course, the atmosphere is quite different from that of America yet The Signboard can depict a truce at home as well as abroad. It shows the native selfishness of mankind whether French or Anglo-Saxon. In some respects, we are all very much alike. The Pale Young Man and The Mummy's Foot are most characteristically French as any one would suspect knowing ought of the writers. The last story is diverting and depicts the love sorrows of a young man, stricken with deafness; but fortunately, the story teller has the means of restoring him to health and, of course, happiness. Few stories are put forth in more attractive form than those which this firm sends out and many of them are of high quality. We like The Signboard. It is a good story and it is in good company.

The Scientific American sends out its September Builder and Architects edition, as ever, filled brim full of excellent devices for making mankind more comfortable. LIGHT notes with pleasure the growing tendency towards the Colonial and various English styles to the effectual drawing away from Frenchness of all kinds, Mansard roofs included.

This month brings No. 1 of Vol. XII of Education, one of the most discriminating of the monthlies devoted to educational matters under the management of Mr. Frank H. Kesson. It is deserving of a wide and critical reading. "Eighty Years Running a Boundary," by Wm. Barrows, D. D., is a good supplementary lesson in geography for the very highest pupils. "Civic Instruction" touches upon a most pertinent theme, viz. good citizenship. "Primary Education in New Zealand" takes us to the Antipodes, while "Female Education" and "How to Study" are always pertinent subjects. Of such articles as the editors, on Horace Mann, we cannot have too many.

Dr. Wm. A. Mowry who founded the magazine and, till his association with Mr. Kesson, was sole editor, has severed his connection and is now superintendent of schools in Salem. The city is to be congratulated on getting the services of an honest, capable, zealous and high minded gentleman.

Ingalls Home and Art Magazine, published by J. F. Ingalls, Lynn, Mass.

Though the magazine is more as a help to those who paint still it takes up many other branches of art work. The several pages of hints on charcoal and water color painting are very valuable to the amateur. The needle work pages have many articles that may be utilized for the coming Christmas. It is so nice to have things come long enough before so that we need not be hurried in our preparations. Price of the magazine, $1 per year.

Elsie, by W. Heimburg, from Rand, McNally & Co., publishers, Chicago and New York.

Elsie is a sweet little German story that has been translated by Hattie E. Miller. It is a story of love but such never grow old and this with its baby Elsie to begin the tale, will captivate all hearts. The story is of two bachelors, cousins, the first of whom to present an heir, is to have, should it be a boy, the estate of the uncle. Elsie so disappoints her father by being a girl that he cares nothing for her, and her aunt takes her away and brings her up in the castle. She falls in love with a German officer and runs away from home to avoid marrying the old cousin whose sons are dead, and the estate will go to the crown for lack of an heir. The story ends with the adoption of the young officer as his heir, and Elsie marries him, and so all ends correctly as it should.

The Home Magazine, The Brodix Publishing Co., Washington, D. C.

We turn first to the article of Mrs. Logan who writes entertainingly of Deserters, Refugees and Contrabands, as seen by her during the war. Then a paper on the French Legion by Mrs. Mary Logan Tucker is of interest. Next month a new department is to be added on music which will no doubt please many. There are many short articles on various subjects, all pleasing and some illustrated nicely. Price only 50 cents.

Rudyard Kipling's new novel, written in collaboration with Wolcott Balestier for The Century, is entitled The Naulahka, a Tale of West and East. It is a story of America and India. The principal characters live in a "booming" Colorado town, where the story opens, but the scene quickly shifts to the court of an Indian maharajah, whither the hero and the heroine journey to meet with most varied experiences. The story will begin in the November Century.

Vick's Magazine, as ever, is a storehouse of interesting matter for those who like fovers, and who does not? Like him who hath no music in his soul such an one ripe for treason.

Hints for the Million from Rand, McNally & Co., publishers, Chicago, Ill.

This book comes in paper covers, is of convenient size and contains something on almost every subject concerning the home. A good many recipes for preparing food, some for the diet of the sick, medicine, drinks of all kinds that can be made at home, hints on the care of the garden, and also the animals about the farm. In fact, though the book is not large, it contains a deal of practical knowledge for any and all who peruse it.

Table Talk from Table Talk Publishing House, Philadelphia, Penn. Price $1 per year.

The first article is on Pickles and Catsup. The article on fruit is especially good in its lessons for the beginner. The new menus will be carefully gone through to find new hints for use in our own homes. The housekeeper's inquiries help many of the readers, they are so clear in their explanation of things asked about. The guest chamber, the fashions, and other papers on different subjects are all good, and fully up to the mark reached by former numbers.

Miss Alice M. Fletcher of the United States Interior Department and the Peabody Museum, Cambridge, will contribute to The Century in 1892 the results of her studies of the American Indian in a series of illustrated papers. They will give an intimate account of how the Indian actually lives and thinks, his music, home life, warfare, hunting customs, etc., and it is the opinion of Professor Putnam of Harvard that they will undoubtedly be the most important papers that have ever been published on the subject, and that they will give an entirely different idea of the Indian from that now commonly prevailing. The series will be called The Indian's Slide.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, will issue this month Victor Hugo's Hernani, edited by John E. Matzke, Associate in Romance Languages, Johns Hopkins University. This edition is to meet the wants of college students. It contains an introduction to show the true position of the play in the history of the French drama, and the notes furnish the information necessary to a correct appreciation of the text.

Here is a romantic anecdote about Louisa Alcott's father and mother. As a young man, Mr. Alcott, so the story goes, was amanuensis or secretary to Mrs. Alcott's father. The two young people met often and naturally fell in love with each other. Mr. Alcott's social position and prospects being somewhat uncertain at that time, he did not feel justified in asking this well-born and talented young woman to marry him. He finally gave up his position and they parted with no confessions on either side. It was agreed, however, that each should keep a journal, and that these journals should be exchanged once in so often. Thus matters went on for some time; he, unwilling to ask so much and offer so little; she, willing to give all and chafing under a woman's necessity of keeping silent. At length, one day, while reading the journal he had sent her, she came across a few sentences in which he hinted at his love and unhappiness, and wondered what she would say if he should ever presume to ask her hand in marriage. The moment was a critical one, but Mrs. Alcott was equal to it. Seizing a pen, quickly and clearly she wrote underneath: "Supposing you ask her and find out!" It is said that the journal is still preserved in the Alcott family.—Argonaut.

Mrs Henry Ward Beecher's personal memoirs of her husband, under the title of "Mr. Beecher as I Knew Him," will begin in the October issue of The Ladies' Home Journal.

Old South Leaflets.

Several interesting and important new leaflets have just been added to the general series of Old South Leaflets, issued by the Directors of the Old South Studies in History and furnished by D. C. Heath & Co., Boston. All of them are connected with the English Puritan period, and are of the highest value in the study of the development of our own political system. They include the Petition of Right, presented by Parliament to King Charles in 1628; the Grand Remonstrance; the Solemn League and Covenant, which gave the name of "Covenanters" to the Scottish Protestants; the Agreement of the People; the Instrument of Government, under which Cromwell began his government; and Cromwell's First Speech to his Parliament. These Old South Leaflets, furnishing these famous original documents, heretofore almost inaccessible to the mass of the people, for the few cents covering their cost, are invaluable. There are now nearly thirty in this general series, and none of them are more important than the half-dozen Puritan documents which are the latest additions.

The following is a complete list of the Old South Leaflets, general series, already published:—

The Inland Printer, Vol. VIII, No. 12. September, 1891, The Inland Printer Company, Chicago, Ill. $2 per year.

This number ends the eighth volume and each number is a treasure house of fact and fancy; fact in the way of instructive matter and fancy in the pictures that grace many of the pages. Nothing in the way of half tone can be better than some of these illustrations. "Pretty Little Chickadees" in this September copy shows six little children sitting on a fence. They are as the girls say, "Perfectly lovely." The correspondence and the notes are timely and entertaining. A full page of nine portraits shows the foremen in the leading newspaper composing rooms in Chicago. A fine looking lot of men.

A Study in Words.

"John," said a farmer to his man,
"This grass will make good hay.
The weather's fine, do all you can
To caucus it today."

"To caucus it! what's that?" asked John
The master thus replied—
"Why, that's a phrase synonymous
With 'Have it cut and dried!'"

Mr. Wilton's Pastimes.

"Now who is that man? I've met him somewhere."

So cogitated Mr Wilton, the wealthy manufacturer of—who, as rain had commenced falling had taken a street car instead of waiting for his carriage. He had but just seated himself when the car was stopped and a sad-faced man fairly dragged himself into the only vacant place just in front of Mr. Wilton, passed his fare to the conductor and with a long sigh dropped his head on his hand.

Mr. Wilton's quick ear caught that sigh and the sad face drew his eyes from all others on the car, all the while wondering where he had seen it. The car stopped. A poorly dressed woman with a babe on one arm, a large basket on the other, a little lad clinging to her skirts, looked in vain for a seat.

As is often the case, most of the passengers seemed smitten with sudden blindness. The sad-faced man raised his head and seeing no one stir beckoned her to his seat, helped her and the children into it and took a place just beside Mr. Wilton's seat on the step.

"Hang it, I ought to stand instead of that tired looking fellow," thought the millionaire, touching him on the arm and crowding along.

A grave "thank you I leave soon" and a few blocks beyond he stepped off.

Mr. Wilton too, soon alighted at his fine residence where at the window smiling a surprised welcome, stood his noble wife and lovely daughter. A servant opened the door and to their inquiry why he had not waited for the carriage replied "I thought I'd try the car today and I should like to know the name of a man who was in it."

"Who pray?"

"Why, he gave up his seat he had just taken, to an ugly dressed woman and two babies and stood the rest of the way, though he looked tired enough to drop."

"I'm sure it was very kind of him" said his wife.

"Indeed it was. If she had been young and pretty who would have wondered, and where have I met him before."

"Describe him, father."

"In few words, he looked sadder than death."

"Just what we said of Mr Barbour as he sung at the chapel last night." Clapping his knee, Mr. Wilton exclaimed, "just it, that's the man, I saw him there the week before."

"I've missed his wife of late, perhaps she is ill. We will make inquiry tomorrow."

Dinner waited and contentedly discussing it, enlivened by the bright sayings of Archie the only son, the Barbours were forgotten for the time. Was it any wonder, with Mr. Wilton's endless calls upon time and money, expected to help on all social and religious movements, always ready and willing, large hearted, a little eccentric, yet withal a noble Christian, that the sad face of his fellow traveller slipped out of mind?

This sad man, Anson Barbour had been married about a year to a bright unselfish member of the choir of the church where he had modestly given his services as leader.

From a most uncongenial home he went on at last to share his by no means abundant possessions.

Having a situation in a large manufactory at the time, he hoped with economy to be able to make at least a comfortable home for Millie and in time be able to earn more at the shop. Unfortunately the foreman at the manufactory had, all unknown to Anson or Millie, been casting about some time for an introduction to her, determined if possible to make her his wife. Disappointed and angry that Anson had so thwarted his intentions, he at once discharged him, assigning as the excuse, when asked the reason by Anson, that work was dull and he was not needed. A month went by and to all his anxious search for employment as yet had only come disappointment to Anson, and things were becoming very sad at his home.

"I really grudged the fare today, but I was so completely fagged when I got back from Water street, I had to take a car," he said to Millie, as they discussed the situation that night.

"What are we to do, Millie? Jenks hated to trust me any more, and I could not tell him how soon I could settle last month's bill when he asked."

Poor Millie, she could eat no more, but bravely held back tears, and said "Now Anson, after you left this morning something almost like an audible voice said, 'why don't he apply at the Wilton Works,' and it kept coming to me all day, while about my work and now wont you in the morning try there?"

"Are you wild Millie? I was hardly skilled enough for the work I've been doing, and the work at Wilton's is far finer and more intricate."

"But do try Ansy, I feel sure you will succeed and get work, will you?"

"I'll do it to please you, but I'm getting tired of refusals," and the hopeless face fell again on his hand.

"Good boy" said Millie patting him as she cleared the table.

At ten the next morning he stood beside the foreman at the Wilton Works and proffered his request. A grave but not unkindly looking man, he asked what kind of work he was used to doing, and where he had been employed. He said "we are quite full now and I really don't think of anything at all like what you have been doing. Why do you leave the K—s?"

"I was discharged."

"Oh," and the keen eyes of the foreman searched the candid, sorrowful face, and somehow thought none the worse of the man.

He asked "have I seen you at the South End Chapel?"

"Yes, I attend there occasionally."

"I thought so. I'm sorry I can't give you work, but really,"—and here seeing poor Anson's head drooping, said "I will speak to Mr. Wilton, though it is against the rules, as he wishes me to hire without troubling him, wait a moment," and he disappeared in the office, where luckily he found Mr. Wilton alone.

"Don't like to break rules sir, but here's a man after work, who seems rather an uncommon kind. Should judge him thirty or thereabouts, respectable, Christian I presume, as I've noticed him appear at our chapel of late and interested in the service."

"Well," with a little frown, "is there work for him, is he needed?"

"No, sir, not particularly. I could find him some light work but the pay would be small. I wish you would see him."

"Send him in, no time to waste."

In a moment Anson stood before the man who the day before had so admired him on the car, but whom he in his sad preoccupation had noticed so little as not to recognize him now.

But the keen eyes knew him instantly and the rich man's face grew a shade less annoyed.

"Want work, Birenkek tells me, got a family?"

"A wife only."

"Any references?"

"None, I was discharged from my last place through a personal spite of the foreman, not dissatisfaction with my work."

"Had decidedly, foreman exceeded his rights. Birenkek thinks he may find something for you, say to him he may," and rising, he took his hat, and Anson with a "thank you" went out and gave the message.

"Report in the morning and I will have work ready for you, but I must tell you the pay will be small at present.

"I will not complain" and he was gone hardly knowing how he got home, but as Millie opened the door and with one glance at his face exclaimed with shining eyes, "there I knew you would get a place" he swept her along in his arms into the little sitting-room, this grave man, with almost boyish abandon.

"Tell me all about it," she said as they sat down to their frugal dinner,

He told her, but added, "Don't be too hopeful Millie, the pay will be quite small, I expect, for the present."

"But I shall be all the more economical" and what do you think, those good souls the Woods, brought us from the farm today, vegetables enough for the winter almost."

"They have! well let us be thankful and God bless them."

He reported in the morning at the Wilton Works and was assigned a light kind of work by the foreman, who was quite sure even that was not what that slight delicate looking man was fit for. In fact he was not a skilled workman, never would be, he sadly thought as he took his place resolved to do his best and put aside dreams. In early boyhood his musical talent had been considered marvelous but losing his parents at thirteen, he had been taken by an uncle into his store and, what with hard work and no kind of sympathy with his efforts to cultivate his talent he had been obliged to give up the hope of ever being proficient in it, only improving all the opportunities he could get in the church choir, where he was so helped on by an admiring chorister as at last to be given his place. And here he had met Millie—and his fate.

Disappointment had aged him somewhat, and yet there was something in his grave face and in the fine tone of his voice that attracted her, when younger men who wooed failed.

"How's the new man?" said Mr. Wilton to Birenkek a few days after Anson's employment.

"That man does his best I believe sir, but there—he's so full of music that he will never be a good mechanic. In fact I don't think the man is stout enough, for he looks mighty bad by night, I've noticed, ought to give it up and get his bread by music, be glad enough to do it I guess."

"Ah," and the grand face dropped, a minute of cogitation, and Mr. Wilton said,

"Keep him till the end of the month, pay him well and we'll see."

Burke knew what that meant. He had known before of cases when his employer had "seen" to the great advantage of more than one poor inefficient workman, out of his proper place, and so he set his good heart at rest about Anson, kept him at work through the month and paid him so much more than he had expected that he went home and told Millie he felt as the brethren of Joseph did, afraid almost.

"And I'm so thankful. Now we can pay off Jenks, and see how small our bill is this month."

"You have economized Millie and deserve a new bonnet."

"No, I will have none this month. Come, eat your supper."

Mr. Wilton had, after talking with his foreman, taken up the morning paper and read a notice of the music committee of C— Church for a choir leader, and, putting the paper in his pocket, hastened round to one of them.

"I see you want a leader. I've got your man. Want to hear him?"

"Yes, when, and where?"

"Drop into H— Street Chapel, Sunday."

They did, and Anson, cheered by his brightening prospects, sang as never before. His fine voice, completely under control, quite took the committee by storm and after consultation they addressed him a note stating their wishes and offering a liberal salary and requesting an answer at once.

"Why Anson Barbour!" said Millie as, with tears actually in his eyes, he laid the note in her hands, "Where did they hear of you?"

"I know no better than you, but am I qualified? It is a large critical church, and if I should fail, give up a certainty for an uncertainty—"

"But you won't. There sit right down,"—opening his desk—"and write an acceptance, with thanks. You can never stand the work at the shop, do you suppose I have not seen it for the last week and worried over it?"

He posted his reply and then went to the shop to give his notice to Brenkee, hoping if possible he might be released at once, as he wished to devote his whole time to practicing in preparation for his new place, so he told Brenkee. That wise man, whom his chief had from the first instructed that he was to be a silent partner in the business, referred him to Mr. Wilton. To him he went asking for a release at once.

With feigned astonishment that gentleman exclaimed:

"Well really, Barbour, I congratulate you, for Brenkee tells me this is far more to your mind."

"That is true but before going I desire to return my thanks for your kindness to so entire a stranger as myself."

"Don't be too sure. I think I knew a little of you before, and that not to your disadvantage. 'Actions speak louder than words' is the adage. You are at liberty to go at once and success to you. I expect to hear from you as the noted tenor soon."

How he and Millie wondered over the adage Mr. Wilton had quoted to Anson. How could he have known anything of him they asked as with glad hearts they discussed the future that night.

The committee had asked him to be at the church on the next Saturday evening when the new organ was to be tried before a select audience of musical people.

"Now I'm in for it, Millie, they'll be critical to a degree, I must practice every hour until then and if I should fail—"

"You will not fail, you will be helped" and a trusting devout expression came over the hopeful face.

Saturday night came. Mr. Wilton had sent his wife and daughter in the carriage, declining their invitation to go with them. After the audience were all in he crept softly into a back seat prepared to enjoy to the full his pastime. In a back seat, across the aisle, sat Millie excited, expectant.

The organ preluded, the choir rose, and Anson commenced the selected number in a soft minor strain. As his voice rose in stronger, more triumphant tones, the full choir swelling the chorus, Millie watching Anson's face full of enthusiasm, trembling with excitement, her eyes full of tears, too happy to notice anything about her, was quite oblivious of a pair of keen eyes fixed upon her from across the aisle. Mr. Wilton, who, full of delight, was softly slapping his hands while studying her face, and actually trying to growl out an accompaniment to the rolling notes of the grand organ, grandly played, though he had often declared there was no more music in him than there was in a donkey. Verily he had his reward that night in more ways than one, and when the music ceased, the audience poured out, he slipped past Millie in the aisle with the exclamation, "No caged birds in my works if I know it," and joined his wife and daughter at the carriage door to their surprise, they supposing him at home, but, as they studied his delighted face saw he knew more of the affair than they had supposed, and pretty Mabel declared she believed father had secured this situation for Mr. Barbour, and "I'm so glad he has it. How beautifully he sang and, oh, how radiant his wife's face was as we passed her."

"Good!" said her father. "One woman was happy tonight at least."

"Now do tell us how you managed to keep from him your part in it. How did you silence that committee?"

"Oh they'll keep dark, they are too proud of their chorister to own he was taken from the work bench. As to Barbour I was not going to be bothered with his gratitude."

Mother and daughter exchanged glances of admiration not lost upon the happy man who said:

"Remember this, you are to be silent partners in this too. You are not to deprive me of these little pastimes."

The next day gleefully relating to his foreman, Anson's triumph and enjoying his pleasure in it, he drew a bit of paper toward him, wrote a cheque for twenty-five dollars and tossing it toward him said, "Christmas is near by, the babies—there's a baker's dozen of them aren't they?—will want presents?"

"Not quite so many as that sir, but there might be, considering your gift. You are always kind, I thank you for them and myself too," and the strong face looked a full appreciation of his employee.

"Prime fellow that Brenkee," said Mr. Wilton to himself as he went his way, "Always seems as glad of others' good luck as his own. Never a bit jealous. I declare when I think how he has acted in regard to Barbour, human nature seems a better thing than it averages."

As to Anson and Millie, after the rehearsal that night they pondered a good deal on that exclamation of Mr. Wilton's, and could come to no other conclusion than that he was in some way connected with their good fortune. "If he don't wish us to know all right, but I'm sure Brenkee could tell a little if he chose," said Anson. COUSIN CONSTANCE.

CREEDS.

"He left a load of anthracite
In front of a poor widow's door,
Where the deep snow, frozen and white,
Wrapped street and square, mountain and moor.

That was his deed,
He did it well,
What was his creed?
I cannot tell.

"He had great faith in loaves of bread
For hungry people, young and old,
And hope inspiring words he said
To those he sheltered from the cold.
For man must feed
As well as pray,
What was his creed?
I cannot say.

"In words he did not put his trust,
In faith his words were never writ,
He loved to share his cup and crust
With any one who needed it.
He took the lead
In each good task,
What was his creed?
I did not ask.

"He put his trust in God, and worked
Ever along with hand and head,
And what he gave in charity
Sweetened his sleep and daily bread.
Let us take heed,
Our lives amend,
Adopt his creed,
Nor fear the end."
—E. P. Powell in Liberty and Life.

To-day at three p.m. Mr. Caleb Wall will give a talk on local antiquities in Tatnuck, between the McFarland and Blair estates, His well known enthusiasm and fund of knowledge should ensure many hearers.

The distressing case of Joe Pitts and family comes up again. This time, he deserts his wife and baby on the common. They are better off without him than with him. Dry goods box for a house is not sumptuous.

In Marshfield.

Last Thursday, week, the 10th, inst, old boys and girls, trooped back to Dingley's Corner in Marshfield, once a part of Duxbury and indulged in reminiscence and history. Among others, our Ex-Alderman, P. Foster White, was present and read a poem. His sister, Mrs. Sarah E. Bosworth, was the historian of the occasion. All the exercises were of the most interesting character and were thoroughly enjoyed by the large party present. It is claimed that the first public school in New England was located near this place.

The Village Bell.

How often in still evening I have heard

The vibrant murmur of that ancient bell!
Sweet as the flute notes of a lone night bird,
Its mellow cadence on my senses fell.

High in the bellry like a sentry grim,

It hangs to guard the sleeper town below,
While round about it swift-winged swallows skim,
And on its great beams coo the pigeons low.

"To worship and unto the tomb I call,

Both one and all!" So reads the lettered rim.
A pregnant warning that to great and small,
The tottering aged and the strong of limb.

Fell many a solemn word its voice has spoke,

Though from its perch the funeral train was hid.
In the sad pause that follow every stroke,
It heard the earth fall on the coffin lid.

And when it listened from its sky gilt beight,

And heard the echoed shots at Lexington,
It told in angry clangs how went the fight,
That fused a hundred peoples into one.

Yet merrier peals have loosed its iron tongue,

When wildly rocking till its prison spurned,
It hung half out the bellry when it flung Broadcast the news that peace had now returned.

Thou art no senseless weight of metal, wrought

By bare armed workmen in the foundry's glow,
Whose black floor meteoric showers caught
Like constellations shot from Vulcan's blow.

Thou art endowed with a mysterious power

Like bliff old Friar Bacon's brazen head;
Thou sayest loudly with each fleeting hour
"Time comes, Time is—Time has forever sped!"

Petersham, Mass. —Francis Zuri Stone.

NATURAL MUSIC.

It is a mistake to think that music is a natural art, yet this fallacy was so firmly rooted in the minds of our ancestors that the progress of the modern science was retarded greatly. Music is a natural art only in its elements, in their application it is entirely the product of the mind of man. The young lady who "dotes on music" might feel very indignant if she were told that a mouse dotes on music in just the same degree that she does, which is merely the appreciation of the natural elements of music. Almost all animals and almost all human beings are sensitive to these natural elements and are attracted by them. What are these elements and how do they arise? The first of these elements is symmetry. Every animate being is pleased by a tone, because it presents regular vibrations to the ear, while noise presents irregular and unsymmetrical vibrations. A higher symmetry is found in chords, wherein the different tones bear arithmetical relationship to each other in the number of their vibrations. A still higher symmetry is found in rhythmic structure, where the regular pulsation of accents gives a soothing effect and is appreciated lower down the scale of creation than the human race.

But here the natural elements of music cease. Not a step farther does the leadership of the Deity as expressed in nature take us. All the rest is the creation of man and is as diverse in its results as the different races of man. The Chinaman uses a five-toned scale and we a seven-toned one, yet neither can prove the other race in the wrong. We cannot show scientifically why one melody which displeases us should please some other person. Fetus has said that music is the art of moving the emotions by combinations of sound; and anything that does this to any person is music so far as that person is concerned. The music of China, of India, of Europe, is each a school in itself, yet these schools have the natural elements of music in common, in some degree. It is when modulation and progression come into play that the divergences begin. Nature has not given to man a single modulation. A discord is akin to noise, yet civilized as well as uncivilized nations have heightened the effect of their music by the introduction of discords. Orlando di Lasso in the sixteenth century was the first to find in the discord the language of passion and there are many dissonances which are freely used to-day which would have set the teeth of the early musicians on edge. Only after the year 1594 did the seventh chords come into our music and the diminished seventh about 1600. The fact that our art is the invention of man causes it to be a constantly changing one and the very elements of change fit it more closely to the needs of the human race. But when the fact is once recognized that music is an artificial product made by man for man we shall not be quite so arbitrary in denouncing those who wander into new paths, and we shall admit that even Chinese cacophony comes under the head of music.—Louis C. Elson in the Boston Musical Herald.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Cooper and daughter Miss Ada arrived in Boston Sunday on the "Cephalonia" of the Cunard line from England. The trip combined business and pleasure. While in London Mr. Cooper secured many novelties for the house of A. S. Lowell & Co., of this city. They also visited relatives of Mr. Cooper who live in Scotland.

It is now talked that Col. J. A. Titus, long prominent in local circles, will locate permanently in Orange.

Librarian S. S. Green has issued in pamphlet form an excerpt from the Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, containing his paper on George Bancroft read before that body at its April meeting. Like everything that Mr. Green writes, this paper is scholarly, and entertaining. Many personal items are given that cannot be found elsewhere in sketches of Mr. Bancroft's life. It must give a thrill of pleasure to every admirer of the great Historian.

'Tis not the Swiftest Stream.

'Tis not the swiftest stream,
Or broadest from side to side,
That, leaving its Springtime's dream,
Carries onward the clearest tide.

Oh for a crystal stream,
With pebbles in sight below,
To carry an inward gleam
Of Winter's melted snow!

'Tis not the strongest throat
Of th' woodlands' kingliest bird,
That carries the sweetest note
Or can echo the purest word.

Oh, for a slender throat,
With a low and tender strain,
That can o'er heal a heart's mote,
Calm for an hour its pain!

'Tis not the fairest face,
That smiles on the world's by-ways
That carries the noblest grace,
Or makes brightest the dreary days.

Oh, for a noble face,
That yet for its lowliness,
Can carry an open trace
Of 'the beauty of holiness!

Mr. Andrew O'Connor has again used his hand to a purpose in depicting the bust of Albert Curtis, the man, of all others, who has given to New Worcester its prosperity. It is on exhibition in Peck's Art Store and reflects great credit on the sculptor. Few men can make a chisel better obey the minds behest than our Worcester artist.

No Worcester citizen seems to get more pleasure out of living than Mr. Jerome Marble. He is again off with his wife and friends on a forty-two days' hunting trip to the Far West. Those making up the party on the Excursion Car, Yellowstone are: Jerome Marble and wife, O. M. Ball, Miss Mabel B. Blanchard and Miss Emma Plimpton, of this city; W. E. Harmon and wife, Albert Griffiths and wife and Miss Helen Griffiths, of Boston; Charles Bill, Miss Annie L. Bailey and Miss Carrie J. Emory, of Springfield; Mrs. A. J. Whitney of Warren and W. H. Hutchinson of Lynn.

Miss Ida W. Johnson, who died in Princeton Saturday, week, was a daughter of the late Rodney A. M. Johnson. Her age was about 35 years. For some time her health has been poor and last winter, the most of the time was spent in North Carolina and New Jersey. On the return of warm weather she went to Princeton. Her funeral took place at Plymouth Church chapel Tuesday afternoon in the presence of a large number of relatives and friends. The floral offerings were many and beautiful, including crosses and pillars and many bouquets of cut flowers. The Schumann Quartet furnished music during the services. Rev. W. V. W. Davis of Union Church read the burial services. The burial was at Rural cemetery.

There is as much eloquence in the tone of voice, in the look, and in the gesture of a speaker, as in the choice of his words.

Mrs. Rhoda A Thayer.

This lady, an aged inmate of the Old Ladies' Home, died in Grafton, with Mrs. Davenport, with whom she had been spending the summer. She was born in Medway in 1816, a daughter of John Alby. Early in life, a school teacher, she married Fisher Thayer of Keesville, Ky.

Dr. Loring, Dead.

For many years, the name of this gentleman has been familiar to Worcester people, especially in connection with the New England Fair, so often held here. Year after year, he has spoken on the Agricultural Grounds and at the recent meeting he appeared as rotund and rubicund as ever. The Doctor was a capital after-dinner speaker and he never appeared at better advantage than at the reception given by the Worcester Light Infantry to the Salem Cadets, several years since in Horticultural Hall. He wove in a fine thread of Salem History along with his general remarks that was delightful to follow. Born Nov. 8, 1817, he was in his 74th year at the time of his death last Monday. He had received his share of state and national honors. He has been commissioner of Agriculture and U. S. Minister to Portugal. He ardently desired to be Governor of Massachusetts, but the worst men do not always attain that honor.

Curious Corner.

Who Shall "Bow" First.

A great deal of nonsense has been talked about the questions of whose place it is to bow first when a lady and gentleman meet upon the street or in any public assembly. It is very absurd to say that a man should always wait until a lady has recognized him. In this, as in most other matters, common sense and mutual convenience are the only guides. Many ladies are near-sighted, many others find great difficulty in remembering faces. Are they, because of these drawbacks, to be always debarred of the pleasure of a chance meeting with some agreeable man? The important thing, of course, is that a man should not presume; that, for instance, he should not speak to a lady to whom he has been merely introduced, unless she shows some sign of willingness to continue the acquaintance. Not to lift his hat to her with deference would be rudeness, but he should not stop to speak unless she makes the first movement in that direction.

When two people meet who are really acquainted, it is not the man who should necessarily bow first, or the lady—it is whichever of them is the first to perceive and recognize the other. If a lady is walking and meets a man whom she knows well, and who desires to speak with her, he will, of course, not commit the awkwardness of keeping her standing in the street, but if he has time will beg permission to join her for a few moments and walk beside her long enough for a brief chat. The lady on her part will make it easy for him to leave her when they have exchanged the few pleasant sentences that belong to such a meeting.—Louise Chandler Moulton.

Sixty the Average Age of Senators.

More than half of the constitutional convention of 1787 were men who had not reached the age of 45, while there are only seven men who are not past 45 among the eighty-eight members of the United States Senate to-day, and four of these come from the younger states of the West, where there are fewer old men than in the East, Maine and Vermont having, according to the census returns of age, more than six times as many males past the age of 60 proportionally as Colorado and the Dakotas.

No less than thirty-seven of the eighty-eight Senators, or nearly half of all, are past 60, and nine of them beyond 70, as three others will be within a few months. Mr. Morrill has a colleague from Ohio who, like him, was born in 1810; two who were born in 1816, and three in 1818. Three of these have, like him, sought and obtained re-elections after they were past 70. The average age of all the Senators falls only about a year short of 60.

In the Supreme Court the change is equally remarkable. Since Pierce's day but one man has been placed upon this bench who had not passed the age of 45, while of the twelve appointees during the past two decades no less than four were more than 60 when they took their seats. Of the eight judges left after Mr. Miller's death one is 70 years old, one is 74 and one is 77.

To become an able man in any profession whatever, three things are necessary,—nature, study, and practice.

Small Fresh Fish Baked in a Crust.

BY MRS. D. A. LINCOLN,
Author Boston Cook Book.

Use small fresh fish, like trout, scup, perch, etc. Clean them and wipe dry. Cut gashes one inch apart through the thick flesh on each side. Sprinkle well with salt and pepper. Make a rich crust, with 1 quart flour, into which mix thoroughly 4 level tea sp. Cleveland's baking powder and 1 tea sp. salt. Moisten with thin cream sufficient to make a dough to roll out. Divide into two parts, and roll each part 1/2 inch thick. Lay the fish on one part, leaving two inches space between each fish. Put the other half of the crust over. Cut through the crusts around each fish; pinch the edges together tightly, and lay them some distance apart on a baking tin. Bake about 1 hour. Serve with egg sauce. Cook 1 tea sp. minced onion and 2 table sp. flour in a table sp. hot butter, add gradually 1 pint hot milk. Stir as it thickens, and season with 1 tea sp. salt, 1/2 salt sp. white pepper and 1 table sp. lemon juice. Add the chopped whites of three hard boiled eggs, and the yolks mashed and sifted, and serve very hot.—(Copyright, 1891, by Cleveland Baking Powder Co.)

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Cleveland's Baking Powder is wholesome, leavens most and leavens best. Try it.

Good to Eat.

Tomato Honey.

This honey if well made will take the place of the ordinary syrups. It is of course, by far, more wholesome and pure. To each pound of ripe tomatoes, allow the grated yellow rind of one lemon and six fresh peach leaves; cut the tomatoes into pieces, add lemon rind and peach leaves, and cook slowly until they are soft and well done; then strain them through a bag, pressing hard. To each pint of this liquor, allow one pound of loaf sugar and the juice of one lemon. Boil for a half hour or until it becomes thick like syrup. Bottle and seal.—Table Talk.

French Candies.

If the children can make at least some of the candies they eat, they will enjoy them much more. Here is a good and easy recipe. To every pound of A 1 confectioners' sugar use the white of one egg. Roll and sift the sugar. Put the white of egg in a tumbler, and mark the measurement of it. Pour the white into a dish, and add the same quantity of cream or milk or water. Stir well together, then add the sugar, stirring thoroughly with a silver spoon. Place part of the mixture on a bread board, or, if on hand, a marble slab, or, next better than a board, a large tin tray. Dust a little sugar under the mixture and knead it into it. Roll it out half an inch thick. Cut off bits about an inch in size, and roll them into balls in the palms of the hands. Have ready half pound each of English walnuts, almonds, dates, figs, prunes, and raisins. Place half a walnut on each side of a ball. Roll the almonds in pieces of the dough, shaping them as you please, and dipping them in sugar as you shape them. Stone the dates, and in the openings just left put some of the dough, then roll them with sugar. Set the candy to harden on greased plates or paper. It is delicious. Some of the dough can be flavored with a little vanilla, some with lemon, and some with rose; and any bits of the preserved fruit which was first chopped can be worked up. The chief thing is to know how to make the dough, after that any liberty can be taken in the way of flavoring and shaping.—Housekeeper's Weekly.

Fish is very good turned in salted flour, or salted egg and bread crumbs, and then put into boiling hot fat to get brown.—Advocate. Sponge Cake.

Five eggs, half a pound of loaf sugar, the grated rind and juice of one lemon, a quarter of a pound of flour. Separate the yolks from the whites. Beat the yolks and sugar together until they are very light, then add the whites after they have been whisked to a dry froth, alternately with the flour. Stir in the lemon, put the mixture in small pans, sift sugar over them, and bake them.

Lemon Rolls.

Take three pounds of flour, one pound of butter, one pound of fine sugar, six eggs, half a pint of milk, quarter ounce of ammonia and sufficient oil of lemon to flavor; make these ingredients into a dough; roll it out into long, round strips and cut crosswise, slanting, into diamond shapes; scallop the tops with the back of a knife; bake on greased tins in a hot oven.—Boston Budget.

Household.

Convulsions.

There are few diseases that frighten a mother more than convulsions and spasms, and yet there is but little danger unless they follow a previous illness, or after a fall. Then there is danger. Some children have such a nervous system that the cutting of teeth, a slight indigestion, a bad ear-ache, a severe fit of crying or anger is apt to cause a convulsion. When a child has a spasm, warm water should be made ready in a bath-tub, the mother or nurse should then undress the child, not on her lap, but on a bed, and above all things, keep cool. Do not tear everything to pieces, but get him undressed as easily and quietly as possible, dip him in the warm water for two or three minutes, but be careful that his head is not jerked about. As soon as the convulsion is over, let the child lie quiet if he will and go to sleep: he will wake up a great deal better. If convulsions are caused by a fall then the head should be bathed with arnicated water (one-fourth arnica tincture to three-fourths water) also given internally two drops tincture of arnica to one spoonful of water.

If caused by an over-loaded stomach or indigestible food, make the child vomit by making him drink warm-water and mustard mixed and rub his bowels. Mrs. P. J. D.

Hot water is a remedy. There is no remedy so easily attained as water. In cases of sudden illness it should occupy a high place as a remedial agent and save calling a physician. Strips of flannel folded length-wise dipped in hot water, wrung out quickly and applied to the neck of a child that has a croup, will give relief in a short time. The flannel strips should be changed every five minutes and made as hot as the child can bear.

And there is nothing that will so quickly cut short a congestion of the lungs, sore throat or rheumatism as hot water, when promptly and thoroughly applied.

A thick cloth wet in hot water and applied to the seat of pain from tooth-ache or neuralgia will give prompt relief. Sprains, old sores, bruises, new cuts, heal more quickly from the constant application of hot water than almost any other remedy and this is the treatment generally adopted in hospitals. A hot water bag taken to bed with a person feeling chilly or having cold feet will often ward off a cold and perhaps an attack of pneumonia. A cup of hot water before going to bed is one of the best cathartics in cases of constipation and has a beneficial effect on the stomach and bowels. Mrs. P. J. D.

E. I. E., Buffalo, N. Y., writes: "If E. A. F., in Inquiry Department, will set a saucer with a little sweet-oil in it, where the red ants are, she will find that they will leave everything else for the oil; out of it they cannot get; I have tried it for several years and have never known it to fail. It may be too late for this year, ours have all gone—but it is a good thing to remember for another year."—Table Talk.

Do not rub flannels on a board. The main thing is quick drying, and that they be washed and rinsed in water of the same temperature very quickly, and not allowed to cool between. —Boston Budget.

Mirick and Lucinda Mirick you are hereby cited to appear at a Probate Court to be held at Worcester, in said County, on the first Tuesday of October next, at nine o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause, if any you have, why an instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of said deceased should not be approved:

And the said petitioners are ordered to serve this citation, by publishing the same once a week, three weeks successively, in Lacy's, a newspaper printed at Worcester, the last publication to be two days at least, before said court, and to send, or cause to be sent, a written or printed copy of this notice, properly mailed, postage prepaid, to each of the heirs, devisees, or legatees of said estate, or their legal representatives known to the petitioners, seven days, at least, before said Court.

Witness, William T. Forbes, Esquire, Judge of said Court, this tenth day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four.

F. W. SOUTHWICK, Register.

Considerate.

A New Orleans newspaper says that a squad of Confederate soldiers, who were wearing captured blue overcoats, rode up to a house in Tennessee during the Civil War and called out the owner: "Well, old man, what are you, Reb or Yank?" Old Canton was puzzled by the blue coats and gray trousers. "Gentlemen," said he, "I'm nothin', and precious little of that." A similar spirit seems to have possessed a certain aged negro whom a writer for the New York World met some time ago, while wandering over the battle-field of Antietam. "Were you here when the fight took place?" asked the visitor. "Right yer, sah," answered the white-haired negro. "Then you saw it all?" "Well, sah, not zackly; but I saw all de dead folks arter de battle." "Why, didn't you see the movement of the troops?" "Well sah, I was one embarrassed heap that day. I knowed Gin'ral Lee was dependin' on me not to whoop for de Yankees an' Gin'ral McClellan was dependin' on me not to whoop ag'in 'em, an' so I done wen' down cellar an' sat on de head ob a cider barl an' let 'em fight it out de best way dey could."

A Self-raising Nose.

It is doubtful whether the annals of the American stage have anything more ludicrous than an accident which befell Actor Henry Dixey on his last California tour. He was playing "The Seven Ages" at Los Angeles, to standing-room only. In his make-up as the Judge, in the fourth act, Dixey wears an artificial nose—a huge Roman nasal appendage of putty, colored with vermilion and ochre.

Upon the occasion referred to, Dixey made the discovery that the property-man had neglected to provide putty for that rubicund, judicial nose. Hastily summoning a call-boy, Dixey sent him out to the nearest grocer to procure some flour. Dixey hastily mixed the flour with a little water, kneaded it into dough, fashioned it into the semblance of his putty nose, and painted it as usual. The result was eminently satisfactory; the dough was lighter than putty and more adhesive, while there was no difference in appearance.

After a short wait the curtain was rung and the fourth act proceeded. It was a warm night and the heat from the gas footlights was quite oppressive. By the time Dixey had finished the celebrated dance in that act, and had responded to an encore, he was perspiring freely. This combination of circumstances had a most wonderful effect upon the comedian's artificial nose. The members of the company were thunder-struck to observe that the most prominent feature of the Judge's physiognomy was growing, and growing very rapidly, too.

Within three minutes from the beginning of the act that wonderful nose had doubled in size and was still growing with a persistence which threatened soon to eclipse the other facial features. The orchestra noticed the phenomenon and every player stared at it in astonishment. Then the audience observed the change in the Judge's appearance and wondered how it was produced and what it had to do with the play.

Finally the actor was obliged to slip lightly from the stage to take heroic measures for reducing the mysterious and inexplicable swelling of his nose. About two-thirds of it was left in the dressing-room this time, but the fractional proboscis continued its dilating tactics, and when the act closed, the Judge's nose was still much larger than usual.

When the curtain was rung down the members of the company made a rush for Dixey's dressing-room to find out what was the matter. There they found Dixey standing in the middle of the floor with his erratic nose in one hand and a small can of flour in the other. He was reading aloud to himself the printed directions on the can: "Self-Raising Flour—Requires no yeast or leaven. Mix with a little cold water and set in a warm place for a few minutes, when the dough will be ready for baking."—Chicago Mail.

A good story is told of Artemas Ward when traveling on a slow-going Southern road soon after the war. When the conductor was punching his ticket Artemas remark: "Does this railroad company allow passengers to give it advice, if they do so in a respectful manner?" The conductor replied in gruff tones that he guessed so. "Well," Artemas went on, "it occurred to me it would be well to detach the cow catcher from in front of the engine, and hitch it to the rear of the train. For, you see, we are not liable to overtake a cow; but what's to prevent a cow strolling into this car and biting a passenger?"

School and College.

Kindergarten.

Possibly, the first school of this kind established in Worcester was that taught by Mrs. Anna B. Knox. She was a sister of Mrs. Geo. B. Gladwin and was one of the first pupils of Madam Kregie in Boston, herself a disciple of Froebel. This labor was undertaken by Mrs. Knox as a pastime during the stay of her daughter in Vassar College. She opened her school in the Wm. Brown house, once standing where Plymouth Church is now, in 1871. Here she remained two years, encountering from constituted authority about the same usage that all innovators receive and expect from the public, however, she gained a very cordial reception, and from the start she counted among her patrons some of the best people in the city. Later, she moved to Elm street and for a year was in the house that preceded the Y. M. C. A. building. Finally the school was held in the basement of the Public Library building and there was closed by the illness of the teacher, who died with her sister, Mrs. Gladwin, in May, 1876. Among those who patronized this school were J. S. and C. C. Baldwin, Henry Marsh, Stephen Sawyer, A. B. R. Sprague, Wm. H. Goulding and many others. At least two High School valedictorians began their school work here. The progress of most of these children through their school life is a pertinent comment on the success of the system.

High School.

From time to time, an item is seen in our papers as to the abridged course for college preparation. A word concerning the past is not amiss at this point, Twice the School Committee had undertaken a preparatory class for the school and twice had failed. Then, prompted by the fact that recitations were had each afternoon at the school, to the serious injury of both pupil and teacher, for the forenoon given to recitation also, where was the time for study, the Committee voted to establish a five years course. This was in 1880, and was made all the more urgent on account of the recent death of a girl who, it was claimed, had studied too hard. In spite of this vote, no move was made towards the revised course till in the month of January, 1881. Then the Rev. E. H. Hall moved, in a meeting of the High School Committee, that the principal of the school be directed to prepare a course as had already been voted.

This motion prevailed, and Jan. 20, 1881, a report was made, offering two courses, one of four and the other of five years, it being thought that the first was ample for all colleges, save Harvard. The Committee thinking that the year, saved in preparation, would deter many from taking the Harvard preparatory course, remanded the report back to the principal and asked for a course of five years only. On the following Monday, the 24th day of January, the course was reported, adopted and was at once announced to the school. That course has been in vogue ever since or till the recent renovation. The High School Committee in 1881, January, consisted of F. P. Goulding, Esq., Rev. Thomas J. Conaty, Rev. Chas. M. Lamson, Dr. Emerson Warner, Rev. E. H.

Hall, George Swan, Esq., Mrs. Sarah B. Earle, and Dr. Rufus Woodward, a pretty good aggregation of citizens. No one can have any objection to getting a college or any other preparation in the quickest manner possible; but experience has taught that five years are none too many for the average individual to give to Latin, Greek, French, German, Algebra, Geometry and the science now called for in this preparation. What is needed is a system that will admit pupils earlier in their course than now. Boston, Roxbury, Cambridge and other cities admit children at a time corresponding to our VII Grade. If a Latin School in Worcester will bring this favor also, then Hail! But we have been told that not one item in the Grammar School is to be omitted, but whether English or Latin High is the destination, all must go through the Grammar Grades! Many of the High School studies should be begun long before they are or can be as things are now. The reformation thus far is mere surface work. It does not cut deep enough.

Wellesley.

At the final examinations in Wellesley College, June last, the following famous hymn of Philip Doddridge was given to the Seniors to be translated into Latin verse. The version given is that of Miss Lucia F. Upham who elected Latin throughout her course. She was valedictorian of the Worcester High School Class of '87.

AWAKE MY SOUL.

Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve,
And press with vigor on,
A heavenly race demands thy zeal
And an immortal crown.

'Tis God's all-animating voice
That calls thee from on high,
'Tis His own hand presents the prize,
To thine aspiring eye.

Best Saviour, introduced by Thee,
Have I my course begun
And crowned with victory at Thy feet
I'll lay my honors down.

A Doubtful Compliment.

Rev. Baxter—Well, I suppose that I must take a vacation, since the congregation has seen fit to raise the money to pay my expenses. — Sexton—You do not seem over enthusiastic, Elder.

Rev. Baxter—Well, the fact is, James, I've been thinking the matter over, and don't know whether to take it as a compliment or not. Tell me truly, as a friend, James, have my sermons been dry of late?

Sexton—Well, Elder, I do not wish to hurt your feelings, but for the last month you would think that those in the last four rows hadn't had any sleep for a year.
Rev. Baxter (with a deep sigh) — It's as I feared, James; it's as I feared.

CHURCH NOTES.

Two columns of church notes are left over till next week.

Y. M. C. A.

The speaker at the men's meeting at four o'clock tomorrow will be Rev. I. J. Wilcox, the new pastor of Park church. Alfred S. Roe will talk to the boys at three o'clock.

EPISCOPAL.

Rev. F. G. Burgess returned from a vacation trip to Europe Thursday evening. He reached Union Station about nine o'clock, where he was met by Harry W. Anderson and E. L. Barton, who conducted him to St John's church, of which he is pastor, where an informal reception was tendered him by his parishioners.

METHODIST.

The Central Massachusetts M. E. Sunday School Convention will be held in this city, October 21st or 28th, probably at Grace Church.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Hope—The people of the late venture in church enterprises have secured Joseph Cook for a lecture, in Association Hall, Monday evening, Oct. 26. Subject: "Seven Modern Wonders." The subject and its object appeal to every well disposed citizen of Worcester. The hall should be filled to repletion.

Caleb Wall's lecture at Tatnuck, of which there is an announcement elsewhere in this paper, has been postponed one week.

Read under Church Notes, the announcement of lecture by Joseph Cook. It will be his only appearance in Worcester this season.

Forty-Second.

Unfortunately LIGHT cannot do justice to a description of the reunion at Leicester, Thursday; but next week, the affair, successful in every respect, will be rehearsed in detail.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

Holy Cross.

A tennis association has been formed at the college with a membership of 40. J. B. Shannon, '92, is captain and treasurer, and G. P. McDermott, '92, property man.

The Senior or Philosophy Class embraces but four Worcester boys this year, Martin Burns, Peter O'Shea, John P. Phelan and Jeremiah A. Riordan. The Junior class has eleven Worcester boys, while the Sophomore class has twelve.

The ball team will probably cross bats with the Milfords at Milford on Saturday. The base ball association held a meeting last week and elected Dennis O'Neil captain for the next year, and John W. Larkin, manager.

John H. Kelly, well known as the big centre fielder on the college nine and a member of the class of '92, leaves next month to continue his studies in the American College at Rome. James F. Timon will enter the Harvard Law School.

Joseph T. McKeon, Thomas A. McGovern, Patrick M. Mahoney, William A. Gillilan, John A. Reynolds and James J. Dolan, former members of the W. H. S. and H. C. C., leave on Monday afternoon to continue their studies in the Grand Seminary at Montreal.

The wedding is announced of Dr. Michael J. O'Meara and Miss Nellie O'Neil. It will be celebrated at St. Johns church Monday morning at nine o'clock.

Mr. Thomas E. Cunningham, a prominent Forester, who has occupied the highest positions of the order in this city, died suddenly of heart failure Tuesday and was buried from St. Anne's church Thursday morning, the four courts of Forestry in this city doing escort duty.

Rev. Robert Walsh, pastor of Immaculate Conception church, returned home last Sunday after a short trip through Ireland. Officer Lombard arrived on the same steamer with Fr. Walsh.

City Guard Anniversary.

The date of the anniversary parade has been changed from October 24 to 29, on account of the Music Festival.

Mr. Ben T. Hammond, having returned from Europe, will receive his pupils on and after Thursday, Sept. 27th, 1891, at his studio in the People's Savings Bank building, 452 Main Street. Hours from 10 a.m. to 12 m., 2 to 4 p.m., and by special appointment.

Major F. G. Stiles attended the reunion, Tuesday, of one of the companies of the 42d at Medfield, the home of Lt. Col. Stedman.

When Dr. Thomson was Bishop of Gloucester (says a writer of the North American Review) he was occasionally a sufferer from toothache, and resorted, by medical advice, to narcotics, to relieve the pain. One morning, after a night of great suffering, he left the house to consult the doctor; Mrs. Thomson entreating him not to allow the latter to prescribe a narcotic, as it affected his brain for some hours afterwards. On his way the Bishop met the postman, who handed him a large official envelope. He opened it in the street and read, to his surprise and gratification, his appointment to the See of York. He hastened back to communicate to his wife the exciting news. "Zoe—Zoe," he exclaimed, "what do you think has happened? I am Archbishop of York!" "There there!" she rejoined; "what did I tell you? You've been taking that horrid narcotic again and are quite out of your head."

A commercial traveller by mistake handed a merchant, upon whom he had called, a portrait of his betrothed instead of his business card, saying that he represented that establishment. The merchant examined it carefully, remarked that it was a fine establishment, and returned it to the astonished and blushing traveller, saying, "I hope you will soon be admitted into partnership."

About Folks.

Born in Belmar, N. J., Sept. 17, to Mr. and Mrs. J. Leiper a son, grandson of Henry M. Smith of this city.

Among the teachers of Miss Idelle A. Clark, whose card appears in another column, were Mr. Stephen A. Emery and Otto Bendix on the piano, and in theory, Mr. Louis C. Elson, who is the founder of the system. Also she has received instruction from Jules Fichberg.

Lake Glazier.

It is one thing to believe, implicitly. It is quite another to make the public accept our beliefs. Mr. John C. Crane of Millbury, now in the West, is having something of a controversy with Commissioner J. V. Brower and thus far, he appears to have the better of the argument. He cites Brower vs. Brower and to the latter's disadvantage. Mr. Crane is to be commended for the thoroughness of his convictions.

Liscomb-Summer.

The good old town of Shrewsbury, the home for many years of the bride's ancestors, never presented a finer appearance than when the multitude of guests repaired to the old parsonage, now the home of George Sumner, Esq., to see his youngest child, Caroline A. married to Mr. Albert G. Liscomb, all of Worcester. For years, Shrewsbury has been the Summer abode of the Sumner's, where in the old home have been collected numerous souvenirs of the long ago, mementos of that revered pastor of the old First Church. Surrounded by all these tokens of former worth and by a world of comforts and luxuries of today, the young people were united in marriage, Wednesday at noon, the Rev. Calvin Stebbins officiating, assisted by the Rev. J. P. Kennedy of the Shrewsbury Methodist Church. The house was profusely decorated with flowers and from the fire places blazing logs recalled the past. The effect was one never to be forgotten.

The ceremony was performed in the Southwest room where doubtless the bride's great grandfather had performed a like service many times nearly a hundred years ago. Miss Helen Richardson of West Medford was bridesmaid. The bride wore a gown of Canton crepe cut en traine, with pearl passementerie trimming. The long bridal veil was fastened with orange blossoms. In her hand she carried a loose bunch of bride roses, gathered with white ribbon. The bridesmaid's gown was of gray crepe, very simply made. She carried pink roses.

The groom's best man was Mr. P. Barbeau Vale of St. Louis. The ushers were Mr. Jacob Wendell, Jr., and Mr. Geo. H. Kimball both of New York. A reception followed the marriage and a breakfast served by Zahonyi. Putnam's Orchestra furnished delightful music and the wedding presents were numerous and valuable. The young people will reside, after their Western tour, in the Kindred apartment house, Oread Street.

A very pleasant incident was the receiving of a cablegram from Mrs. Liscomb and Miss May Liscomb from Germany, saying: "Best wishes."

Among those present were: Mr. Nathaniel S. Liscomb, Mr. and Mrs. George Sumner, Mr. Edward P. Sumner, Mr. and Mrs. George R. Sumner of Burlington, Vt., Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Sewell of Bath, Me., Mr. and Mrs. Frank Allen, Miss Linnie Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Holman, Mr. Charles R. Holman, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. E. Plummer of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Goodell, Miss Edith Goodell, Mr. John M. Goodell of New York, Miss Mary A. Goodell, Mr. and Mrs. Austin Goodell, and Miss Fannie A. Goodell of Philadelphia, Mr. E. F. Richardson of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Barnard, Miss Mary Barnard, Col. and Mrs. Fred W. Wellington, Miss Alice Goodell, Mrs. E. D. Buffington, Miss Mabel Buffington, Mr. and Mrs. George D. Gifford, Mr. Albert L. Gifford of New York, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Minor and Mrs. Mary A. Eldred of Plainville, Conn., Mr. Fred E. Langley of Newport, K. I. Mr. and Mrs. Otis E. Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur D. Putnam, Mrs. Luther F. Richardson of West Medford and Miss Caroline Sumner, Miss S. W. Howe, and Miss Anna Howe of Shrewsbury.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Every seat is taken," is the stereotyped answer which greets the late comer nightly on application for orchestra chairs at Lothrop's Opera House.

"Storm Beaten," the popular melo-drama, which has Miss Katherine Robber and Max Freeman for heroine and hero, is an excellent attraction and greatly pleases the audiences. Miss Robber as Priscilla Sefton is far ahead of any actress who has been here in the part, and well deserves the generous applause accorded her at every performance. Max Freeman as Christian Christanson, and Wm. Cattell as Richard Orchardson, are fully up to the difficult and artistic work required of them in their respective parts. Mr. Richard Lyle as Pat O'Reilly, an Irish sailor with considerable vocal talent, and John Phillips as Venus, a colored gentleman who has a happy faculty of making things merry with his laughable specialties, were meritorious in their work and well received. In fact, there isn't a poor part in the play, nor an inferior actor in the company. The last performance will be given this afternoon and evening.

"Silent Protection" is the appropriate name of a "roaring absurdity," which precedes each performance. Miss Addie Phillips, Messrs. Lyle, Caswell and Hoffer are well fitted for their respective characters.

"Mardo," a sensational drama by the late Frank I. Frayne, in which Miss Kate Glassford will appear as the star, supported by Lothrop's Stock Company, is next week's attraction. This will be Miss Glassford's first appearance in this city.

All plays produced by Lothrop's several stock companies are rehearsed under the able management and supervision of Mr. H. Percy Meldon.

Mr. Meldon and Miss Tucker are playing to good audiences in "19," at the Grand Museum in Boston this week.

The smiling face of Manager Armstrong conveys the impression to an observer of the well-merited financial success of the new house. "A long-felt want well filled," is the verdict.

Obituary.

Died, at Melrose, Sept. 15th, Capt. Ivory Goodwin.

Mr. Goodwin was born in Kennelbunkport, Me., where he passed most of his early years when not following the sea. He afterwards became engaged in hotel keeping and was for a long time known as the genial host of the Maverick House in East Boston, a popular abiding place of officers of the ocean steamers when in port, and where he remained until his final retirement from business a few years ago.

He leaves a widow and two daughters, a brother and two sisters, one of the latter being Mrs. George W. Gale of this city.

Invitations will be sent out Monday, for the Lakeside Boat Club's closing social, which will take place at the club house at Lake Quinsigamond, Friday evening, October 2nd. The committee having the affair in charge consists of W. E. Fairbanks, F. H. Goodwin and H. L. Green.

The most ubiquitous citizen of Worcester is Jerome Wheelock. The middle of the week he was registered in Washington. It seems only a week or two since he was in Paris and, certainly, in the interval he has been in this office.

The Quinsigamond Boat Club held its closing social at the boat house at the lake Wednesday evening. About thirty couples were present and had a good time. Dancing was indulged in for a few hours and refreshments were served. The affair was in charge of a committee composed of C. H. Bowker and Geo. A. Stearns, Jr.

In Memory of James Russell Lowell.

BY SARAH JEANNE RICH.

O'er all the world, the good, the wise, the true,
Are mourning for thee, Lowell. Spirits sweet and rare
And sympathetic, like the heavenly dew,
Humility at large will love and bless and share.

As "strokes of nature makes the whole world kin,"
As mountains, strength and beauty to the landscape give,
As oceans, kiss all shores with fragrant wind,
So like a beacon light, thou guid'st mankind to truly live.

On breast of mother earth we lay thy precious dust.
And kindred dust keeps company with thine;
For Auburn is the shrine of Longfellow, the just And earnest lover of the beautiful, whose laurels thine didst twine.

The richest kingdoms of the earth, thy loving tribute pay
To thee, whose spotless honor severed not from the right,
But not less dear to thee on Elmwood's lawn the linnet's
by,
Or robin's laddene' note, missing thy voice, at morn-ing's side.

But not less dear to thee, the lowly flower thou sung,
That in the springtime now, will shed its gold on thee,
Because cathedral bells for thee have tolled and rung,
And England's Abbey echoed with praises to thy memory.

As the swift winds the thistles downy spear can roll
And toss far o'er the seas to plant upon the lee;
So o'er all earth's planet many follow to thy goal, Bearing, from seed sown by thee, fruit to bloom eternally.

Worcester, Aug. 15.

BOOKS and BOOKMEN.

The Coming Climax.

A most remarkable political brochure, and one which promises to create a decided sensation, is now in press for early issue by Charles H. Kerr, of Chicago. The author, Lester C. Hubbard, is editor of the Farmer's Voice, and stands in the very front rank of the leaders of the People's party, having been recently chosen chairman of the central executive committee of Illinois. The significance of the forthcoming pamphlet, which will be entitled "The Coming Climax," lies in the fact that it gives a frank and fearless summing up of the elements of danger in the present political and social conflict between plutocrats and workers. It is addressed to the people of cities, and embodies a forcible, direct and definite statement of the claims of the new party on city people. This brochure will be the first step in the organization of the People's party in Chicago and other leading cities, and it will doubtless be eagerly sought for. It will appear as the seventh number of Unity Library, and will retail at fifty cents in paper and a dollar in cloth.

"Mr. Hamlin was one of Maine's noted fishermen," says the Boston Herald, "and one little yearly excursion of his used to puzzle the knowing ones not a little. Every year he prevailed upon the officials of a certain Maine railroad to let him off an early morning train in the middle of a dense forest. He would disappear in the woods, and when the train returned in the evening Mr. Hamlin would be found waiting beside the track to be taken aboard. His basket on these occasions was always found to be filled with magnificent trout, weighing anywhere around a pound to two pounds and over. Nobody else knew of a trout brook in the vicinity that gave promise of any such trout as he got, as the old gentleman always persisted in going alone, and a Maine paper says the exact locality has always remained a mystery."

Fringed Gentians.

Our friend Arba Pierce knows where the choicest treasures of field and forest may be found. Nature's secrets are not hidden from him. He ever receives a hearty greeting, for in his hands he usually bears some trophy of a walk-a-field. Monday, he smilingly brought to LIGHT a glorious bunch of heavenly blue in the shape of the very earliest Fringed Gentians. We are unable to express proper thanks ourselves, so turn to Bryant, the Poet who long since embalmed this beautiful flower in imperishable verse. This is the season of the year to best appreciate their immortal words.

Then blossom bright with autumn dew,
And colored with the heavens own blue,
That openest when the quiet light
Succeeds the keen and frosty night.

Then doth thy sweet and quiet eye
Look through its fringes to the sky,
Blue—blue—as if that sky let fall
A flower from its cerulean wall.

A Well Known Restaurant.

There are many excellent restaurants in this city, but it is doubtful if one can be found better equipped with everything pertaining to a first class eating-house, than the cozy little dining hall at No. 32 Southbridge Street, which is owned and managed by Mrs. L. Benedict. It is situated but a short distance from Main street and is easy of access from all directions. Meals can be obtained at all hours. Strangers visiting this city will be amply repaid by giving this place a visit. Mrs. Benedict makes a specialty of catering to table boarders. The successful business established is well deserved.

Peck's Art Store.

Mr. A. E. Peck, the veteran dealer in art goods at 368 Main Street, has had his rooms thoroughly renovated, and next Monday he will open them for public inspection. That the public will approve goes without saying when the array of elegant objects, properly placed on backgrounds of exquisite colors is beheld. The front room is as of old, in size only, for new paper and painting have wrought a complete transformation. The chief glory, however, is found when we seek the art gallery. Here artisan and artist have united to produce a gem of beauty. The room is square, of excellent dimensions and height, lighted perfectly from above. Around and upon the walls the visitors will find scores of works of art in all forms of tracery. There are etchings, old friends and new; water colors, just from the painter's easel; crayons and engravings of every description. Among other charming objects is a line of French goods just received from a New York house. Amid this scene of loveliness, an object of admiration and respect, the figure of Albert Curtis, just from Artist O'Connor's hand, stands serene. Mr. Peck is entitled to many congratulations over the character of his opening.

Facts Worth Knowing.

Nor iron bars a cage.
The walls are brick, the bars are steel,

CLOTHES MADE TO MEASURE.

Gentlemen appreciate the value of good cloths for their fall suits.

They may not be over particular always as to the firmness of their summer clothing, but when it comes to winter, then the important question of security from fierce New England blasts has to be met and answered before the measure is taken.

No one knows the importance of heavy, thoroughly woven cloths for Worcester gentlemen, better than we know.

How can they?

Year after year we have given this question our utmost thought and constant attention.

Experience has shown us where the perfectly reliable manufacturers are, and we know how to avail ourselves of the best they can do.

We have a call for the best, and it is in harmony with our business instincts to keep the best.

It has been our effort always to show our friends that the very best goods need not be more costly than goods of a lower standard.

We believe it can be proved that it never pays to buy cheap cloths or to lessen the utmost of careful making in clothes.

Five dollars or ten, even, may mean to you but a few cents a week on the real service the clothes give you.

What of that, when you get so much more that is stylish and good and serviceable for so slight expenditure.

Some men always look well dressed.

Ask them and you'll find their Clothes are two seasons old or more.

The reason for it all is that their clothes were well made from good cloth intended to give the best service.

They had the service and they had true economy in it.

We have splendid lines of cloths, we would be pleased to show them to you.

THE ROYAL STEAM HEATER CO.

Gentlemen:—Having purchased two of your Heaters, one now in use this year, the other 2 years, I can safely say we could hardly keep house without one. I would rather take care of our Heater with 15 radiators attached than one parlor stove where I had to bring coal and carry away the ashes. Anyone intending to heat by steam should examine the Royal and note the working of the Grate, which I think is far ahead of any I have ever seen. I will gladly give information to intending purchasers. Respectfully yours F. E. BARNARD, Barnard Bros., Trunk Manufacturers, 494 Main St.

Look at this picture and read.

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a housekeeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility.

One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

VOL. IV. WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1891.

No. 4

The splendor falls on castle walls
And snowy summits old in story
The long light shakes across the lakes
And the wild catarract leaps in glory
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
Blow, bugle, blow, answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

A whole week of music.

The very air has recked with "Linked sweetness, long drawn out."

A year since, or Sept. 14, 1890, at anchor in the mouth of the River Scheldt, a gentleman picked up a copy of the London Times of the 13th, just brought aboard.

The first words that met his gaze were "The Worcester Music Festival." He rubbed his eyes and looked again but there they were clear and bright. He knew that for ten days he had been sailing against the sun and that breakfast had come a half hour earlier every morning but nearly two weeks of time gained was too much for him.

But he plunged into the reading, delighted with anything that savored of Worcester, and found the usual record of musical triumphs; but when the cathedral began to be mixed up in the description, he realized that it was not the Heart of the Commonwealth that he was reading about, but her prototype, the Worcester of old England.

For many years, three English cities, Worcester being one, have had a festival of a high order, the same passing from one city to another. In '90 it was Worcester's turn and the affair seemed to receive just about the same attention from musical England that our own annual singing gets from New England and New York.

It is said that these two Worcesters have many points in common and it certainly is a pleasure to find that one mark of similarity is a musical one. Year after year our city wells forth a volume of melody that astonishes communities much larger than our own, serving as a setting for the gems of sound that have been drawn hither for the public's pleasure.

Could Mechanics Hall tell the story of all the marvels there performed it would be a retail well worth the hearing. Suppose years ago a phonograph had been placed in the hall and that upon it had been recorded the sweet sounds coming from the throats of the many scores of sweet vocalists, we might at our will have reproduced melody that will never be ours again.

Since Secretary Monroe began his arduous duties, a whole generation of star and chorus singers has come and gone. The Madames and Mdles. and Signors and Monsieurs who have complained of the hall approaches have been legion and many have been starved forever, but the festival goes just the same: every year, by general consent, is an improvement on its predecessor. At this rate what will the future be?

Worcester is able to secure this famous success through the early beginning made in our schools. These people in the chorus began their singing under the direction of Mr. Nason or Mr. Richards and, as infants, lisped by note and in time. The festival is set before our youth as a sort of musical Olympus, something to be striven for, an unequalled honor. In a degree, it is to our people what The Passion Play is to the dwellers in Oberammergau.

To the long time resident in Worcester it is very interesting to note the earnest air with which people seek Mechanics Hall, during festival week. It has become almost a duty and, three times a day, some of our citizens, ladies especially, repair to this scene of enjoyment, to follow with score in hand the progress of the program. There is nothing in our city that better illustrates its advance in culture than its devotion to the festival.

About the opening of the Columbian fair on Sunday! Have the advocates for this opening reflected what the extra labor will be for those who are to serve? How about the many attendants who, in one way or another, must be on hand for six days in the week? To add another day without a chance for rest savors of injustice. Then too, those people who have to do with railroads, hotels, etc., they are not considered at all. Possibly the advocates of the opening would have us adopt the French system where every body works so hard Sunday that all rest Monday. To an American, Monday is a dull day in Paris. Are we coming to the French notion? Do we want it? The Puritan Sabbath, dark as some paint it, was infinitely better than the Parisian.

Mr. F. N. Anderson resumes his teaching next Monday and will devote Monday, Friday and Saturday of each week to Worcester. Tuesday will be spent at the "Elms" in Spring field and Wednesday and Thursday at the School of Music in Hartford, Conn. Mr. Anderson's success as a teacher is well attested by the large number of his pupils who are now occupying prominent positions in church choirs in this and other cities.

Sibley—Ross.

The Rev. Dr. Gunnison was instrumental in changing the name of a W. H. S. graduate, class of '87, at her parents' home, No. 2 Charlton Street last Wednesday at 7 p.m., when Miss Jennie L. Ross was married to Dr. Frederick D. Sibley. Only immediate friends and relatives were present. Amid profuse floral decorations the nuptial knot was tied, the groom's brother, Mr. Wm. T. Sibley acting as best man and Messrs. Arthur K. Ross and Albert Hyde as ushers. The young people were pleasantly remembered in the way of many gifts. On their return from a wedding tour, they will reside at Hotel Pleasant.

Carl Zerrahn.

There are many music lovers in Worcester who would have very little faith in our annual feast of sweet sounds were its long time director not here. He has swung his baton over thousands. Since that beginning in 1865, omitting 1868 he has been steadily in place. Very few if any are in the chorus now who first responded to his sway and the stars' The early ones set, long ago. The leader's hair is not of its former hue and, possibly wrinkles have appeared on a brow that twenty-six years since was smooth; but the ear and the eye are as of old. They take in all the good and bad points of the rendering. He is ever the master of the situation. This year makes a full quarter of a century of Worcester Festivals in time, the 20th that he has conducted.

Mr. Zerrahn is a native of Malchow, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany where he was born, July 28, 1826. Music was early indicated as his vocation and the education in this direction, begun in Roslock, was completed in Hanover and Berlin or finished as far as anything so eternally progressive as music can be finished.

He was one of the organizers of "The Germania Musical Society" in 1848. By way of London, where concerts were given, the Germanias came to this country. In September of that year, they landed in New York and began a series of successful concerts throughout the country. They appeared with Jenny Lind, Madame Sonntag, Ole Bull, Thalberg, Alfred Jaell, Camilla Urso and many others, disbanding in 1854. In that year Mr. Zerrahn became the musical director of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston and he still remains in that position. From 1846 to 1882, he was the director of the Harvard Musical Association. He came to Worcester in 1865 and has been coming ever since except in 1868 when he was in Germany. He has appeared as a leader in New York and elsewhere, and has prepared several books for musical bodies. In Peace Jubilee days, he was a prominent factor. Worcester looks forward to many years of leadership at his accomplished hand.

Each year, a number of people from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, attend the Worcester Music Festival. Those here this year were Mrs. Edward Williams, Mrs. Thomas A. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. T. V. Bingay, Mrs. T. B. Crosby, Miss Julia Moody, Miss Blanche Horton, Mrs. Machinnon. Mrs. Bingay has quite a wide reputation as a pianist in the Province, being pianist for the Yarmouth Philharmonic Society.

Mrs. Partington has not been heard from much of late, but she was evidently in attendance at the Festival, as an elderly dame, who was undoubtedly she, was heard to remark at one of the rehearsals, that 'for real enjoyment there is nothing like a Sympathy Concert!'

CHURCH NOTES.

FREE BAPTIST.

The laying of the corner stone of the new Free Baptist Church building, at the corner of Jaques Avenue and Wellington Street, took place with appropriate exercises last week Tuesday afternoon. At two o'clock, the program began with the singing of the Doxology. Rev. Dr. John D. Pickles of Trinity Church offered prayer and Rev. H. J. White of the Pleasant Street Baptist Church read a scripture selection. After the congregation had sung a hymn, Rev. F. D. George, pastor of the church, announced that the laying of the corner stone was under the direction of the Advocates of Christian Fidelity, who had assisted materially in raising the building fund. He then read a list of the articles deposited in the box which was placed in the stone. The corner stone was laid by William P. Armington, President of the local A. C. F. society, assisted by Edwin B. Dow, vice-president of the general society, after which Miss Lizzie Weir read a poem, "Our Corner Stone," written for the occasion by Mrs. F. D. George. Rev. Thomas Spooner of Lawrence led in prayer, the congregation sang again and Rev. Mr. George gave a history of the work in connection with the erection of the building; Rev. H. Lockhart of Lowell, a former pastor of the church, spoke of his former connection with the church; Rev. J. J. Lansing spoke for the churches of other denominations and expressed a desire for the abolishment of strict denominational lines; Rev. George N. Howard of Lowell gave a historical sketch of the Free Baptist denomination. After singing, Rev. W. T. Sleeper pronounced the benediction.

Y. P. S. C. E.

The Pleasant Street Baptist Church was filled to the doors Tuesday evening of last week, when the monthly meeting of the Local Union took place. President Tucker presided. Rev. H. Lockhart, formerly pastor of the Free Baptist Church of this city but now of Lowell, offered prayer and Rev. H. J. White, pastor of the church, welcomed the visitors in a brief speech. The principal speaker of the evening was Rev. I. J. Lansing, who gave an hour's talk on what he saw and heard at the national convention held at Minneapolis in July. At the close of the meeting it was announced that the Pleasant Street Baptist society had the largest percentage of their members present and hence they will hold for two months the banner offered for the society having the largest percentage of members present at the bi-monthly meetings. The Lake View society ranked second in the competition. The next meeting will be held at Park Church in October, when the annual election of officers will take place.

METHODIST

Thomas Street. The members of this church are not the only ones who rejoice that Mr. Eklund is to remain in Worcester the balance of his term. What is Chicago's loss is our gain. We are more than pleased.

Trinity. The second annual banquet of the Epworth League occurred Monday evening, Sept. 14. Tables were set for 150 and every seat was taken. The first exercises of the evening were participated in by all. After supper President John Legg introduced the toast-mistress, Mrs. G. H. Brackett. With well chosen words she introduced the speakers who responded as follows: "Why our League is Epworth League," John Legg; "We extend to you a Welcome," Miss Edith G. Kinney. In welcoming the guest of the evening, Rev. W. I. Haven, she made a touching allusion to his sainted father, Bishop Gilbert Haven; "Look up, Lift up," Rev. W. I. Haven. This motto calls us to avoid looking down, looking too much on a level to the affairs of others, or inward at ourselves, but look up to Christ and lift others up to Him. "A Young Man's Influence on our League," William D. Chase; "Faults and Faculties," Joseph K. Greene. We are not responsible for our faculties but we are for their development. "A Young Woman's Influence on our League," Miss Jennie M. Dann. A pure noble life will make itself felt. "Our Reading," Rev. J. D. Pickles called attention to our denominational literature, and urged that we read systematically. We need to know also what not to read. "Our Opportunities," Miss Florence M. Sears. It is our duty to improve them. They come to us every day.

"And it's not the thing you do, dear,
It's the thing you leave undone,
Which gives you the bitter heart ache
At the setting of the sun."

There were also songs by Miss Jessie Pond and Miss Annie Smith accompanied by Geo. N. Morse. Over the company was the outline of the League Cross formed by the League colors, red and white, stretched between the posts in the middle of the vestry.

Y. P. S. C. E.

At the meeting of the executive committee of the Local Union, held in the Y. M. C. A. parlors Monday evening, the Endeavor society of the Baptist church of Millbury was admitted to membership and arrangements were made for the special meeting of the Union at Park church, Tuesday, October 13, when the annual election of officers will occur. Mr. Lingley of the Pleasant Street Baptist society, Dr. Bristol of the Millbury Congregational society and Miss Gay of the Main Street Baptist society were appointed a committee to nominate a list of officers to be voted upon at the meeting.

The chairmen and members of the temperance committees of the city societies are requested to meet in the Young Men's Christian Association building next Tuesday evening. It is desired that they bring scissors and pencils.

Y. M. C. A.

Last Saturday's Boston Traveller contained a portrait and sketch of the Worcester association's building.

Two of the soloist at the Music Festival this week are to appear in the Association course of entertainments. Miss Laura Burnham, the soprano, will be here October 29, with the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club and Herbert Johnson, the tenor, will appear December 17.

Main St.—Last Sunday at 6 P. M. a memorial tablet to the memory of Deacon William Ward was dedicated, speaking being by the pastor, Mr. Pendleton, and by Principal D. W. Abercrombie of the Academy. The inscription is as follows:—

"WILLARD WARD,

Festival Notes.

Wednesday afternoon between the movements of Schuman's Symphony, photographer Blair took a picture of the chorus, orchestra and conductor Zerahn. Evidently the chorus did not know that the picture was to include them, for they waved their fans and moved their bodies unconcernedly. Considering light, and circumstances the result was fairly a success. The orchestra and leader are quite good.

It might be added to the item concerning the Hon. W. W. Rice's health that he not only rides out, but walks out as well.

Col. Wellington returns the Cushing Battery visit to Worcester by a run down to Fort Adams in Newport.

Miss Mabel Norcross and Miss May Goulding leave October 1st to attend Mrs. Meade's Hillside school, Norwalk, Conn.

Daniel Seagrave has been elected a lay delegate to the general convention of the Universalists, by the state convention, now in session at Norwood.

A Great Festival.

The thirty-fourth in number of years, this week's Music Festival has been No. 1 in quality.

From the "Arminius" down to the "Israel in Egypt," the success has been continuous, and the large audiences that have attended every concert have applauded to the echo the performance of works which, in their selection as a matter of taste and of musical progress, have commended themselves to the critics and the great mass of the people alike.

The week started off with the usual day of rehearsals, which gave but slight promise of what was to come. On the first day, there is always a disheartening "tuning up" of the orchestra, and a preliminary effort of the chorus. As Holmes puts it:

"You hear a sound, that seems to wear
The semblance of a tune,
As if a broken life should strive
To drown a cracked bassoon."

Not quite as bad as that, of course, for the bassoon that dared to crack under Mr. Zerrahn's baton and the magic influence of the Festival, would commit the unpardonable sin.

But on the second day things started in very smoothly, and the organ recital in the afternoon, now a fixed feature of the week, though the least satisfactory concert, had much of interest in its make up.

It is pleasant to repeat old favorites, from time to time, and the fact that "Arminius," was to be heard for the third time met with expressions of general satisfaction. The Festival here struck its key-note of success, which was sustained through the three succeeding days.

But after "Arminius," there was little in the way of past programs. The new works which followed have attracted much attention from the outside world, and the critics who have always said that the Worcester Festival management is not professional are silenced this year. Several works entirely new to American audiences were presented, and aside from these, the selections from the "old masters" were timely.

The chorus began its work grandly with "Arminius," but it did not cover itself with an equally scintillating glory in all that followed. This was not so much because it was unable to cope with the music, as because it had attempted to learn too much in too short a time. Mr. Herbert's choral work suffered on this account, and so did the Lohengrin finale. Such music can only be rendered after the most diligent and extended study. Mr. Zerrahn's inspiring presence and direction cannot make up for the insufficiency of labor. The chorus must learn that motto of the three things necessary to success: "Work, work, work." Yet this must not be taken as an expression of dissatisfaction with the body of singers itself. It is a faithful chorus, and it sang many things with abundant ality.

New artists came to us this year, and they brought no disappointments. It is true, there were some performances not up to the standard, but not in crucial places. Their work was generally more than satisfactory. The orchestra did excellent work.

Of Mr. Zerrahn, it need only be said that he was, as he has been in many years past, the spirit in the flesh which lifted the impulse of the whole to a lofty plane.

The Festival management is to be complimented on its arrangement of the programs, and can hardly find fault with the generous praise accorded them through the week.

The First Program.

In some ways, the organ and song recital, with which the work of the Festival really began, on Tuesday afternoon, was a good deal more of a concert than that of last year; in other ways it was not nearly so much so. The organ work was made the chief feature, a year ago, and there were only two or three vocal numbers put in to give the program something of variety; but this year it became a concert in regular form.

Mr. G. W. Morgan, the veteran organist, found a fine instrument ready for him, and the audience found in the player a master of the instrument. Probably the number for the organ and harp duet, the Oberthur Larghetto, in which his daughter figured as the harpist, pleased the people as well as anything he played; but his own "organ fantasia," a variation of themes from Wagner's "Tannhauser," was one of the best things ever brought out on the Mechanics Hall organ, and his remarkably beautiful rendering of the composition brought him unstinted applause, to which he was forced to respond with a second number, by way of encore, it being "The Sad Sea Waves," a ballad by Sir Jules Benedict, with extemporizations by Mr. Morgan himself.

Miss Maud Morgan, who appeared as the harpist, won a little triumph of her own, aside from that she shared with her father in the duet, by a harp solo from John Thomas's "Seasons," entitled "Autumn." Her touch was firm, her method graceful, and the unpretentious music found ready liking among those in the audience, which was extended to the encore number she played, a pretty little "Lullaby" by Hasselman. In the trio for the harp and flutes, she had less opportunity to display her command of the instrument, but she bore her part well even there. It was a selection from Berlioz's "The Childhood of Christ," and lacked any remarkable charm.

Three ladies sang at this recital. One, at least, came with a ready welcome from Worcester people. Mrs. Ada May Benzeng, née Drew, used to sing to friendly ears at Plymouth Church, and the announcement that she would appear at the Festival pleased a great many of her friends and admirers. Her song was a patriotic one of Mattei, into which she put all the earnestness her deep contralto voice could command, but she was not really at her best, and though she was generously applauded, she did not sing again.

Miss Laura M. Burnham sang the long cavatina from the "Carnival of Venice," as arranged by Benedict, and could not claim to have scored a great success. She would very likely have done better in a simple ballad.

Probably there would be no serious dispute among the solemn gentlemen in the critics' row, as to the award of the palm to Mrs. Karinka Paulsen-White, who sang the aria, "Plures mes yeux," from "Le Cid," by Massenet, and did it so well that she was recalled at once. Mrs. White has never been heard here before, and indeed is not very well known. She is a Norwegian lady, the wife of a Winchester gentleman, and it is evident that her music is all true art to her. She has a voice of pure and resonant quality, and showed thorough understanding of her notes.

Mr. Herbert Johnson, to whom the suggestion of his Ruggles Street Quartet connection will probably cling a long time yet, came out and sang an Italian aria, "Cielo e Mar," from "Da Gioconda" by Ponchielli, in ordinary voice.

The afternoon's performance, in detail, had some faults, and lacked the successful and judicious arrangement given the programs which were provided for succeeding miscellaneous concerts but there is no doubt that the idea of a regular program is pleasing to many who patronize the festival, and that something beside the heavier organ numbers must be provided in order to win their continued approval. To the acute taste of the musician, the opportunity for organ solo work is one to be improved to the utmost, but there are musicians and people who like music, and it is unfair to treat the one class to its favorite draught, at all times, without considering the palate of the other.

Arminius.

The famous Campanini shone as "the bright particular star" at the Tuesday evening concert, and his wonderful tenor, which his unfortunate illness has been said by some to have seriously impaired, did not reveal any loss of strength or quality in the Siegmund work of the "Arminius." Campanini sang enthusiastically and he got an enthusiastic welcome in return.

He had able coadjutors in Mr. Heinrich Meyn, the baritone, who sang the part of "Arminius," and in Miss Lena Little, whose contralto was effective as the Priestess.

Max Bruch, German by birth and German in all his musical instincts, wrote nothing better than this strongly dramatic oratorio, full of splendid music, both chorus and solos, and in no place strained or lacking energy. It tells the story of the revolt of the German tribes against their Roman oppressors, in the first years of the Christian era, and brings out the mysticism of their forest-sheltered religion and their warlike uprising in perfect pictures painted in musical utterance. Woman has ever figured in the great movements of peoples and history gives her an always important place even in the annals of early pagan tribes. The Priestess of Wodan is given an appropriately effective part, therefore, in this oratorio.

The choruses of the work are uniformly strong, and the opening, "What is 't that looms like thunder-cloud afar?" throws forth the first strong picture. The chorus went at it with a will, Tuesday evening, and save for a very few minor qualifications, deserve to have it said that they have never sung better. Mr. Zerrahn did not have to rap for their attention but once, and they kept their eyes on him in a way that must have gratified the veteran conductor and was certainly an improvement over some of their past records in that direction. "Arminius" is not involved in its chorus work to the degree of many works of this dramatic character, but it does need the closest attention to the conductor's direction, and all the force that the chorus can command. If there was a slow attack once or twice, it was not seriously bad, and the evenness of the volume was immensely effective.

It is understood that this was the first time that Campanini has attempted to sing English words. He has been faithfully studying to sing in English opera, for some time, and deserves a compliment for his success. Of course, he did not "Yankelky" the words, but his odd little accent was not at all disagreeable, and he could be readily understood, with an occasional glance at the words. Campanini is wonderfully sympathetic. That touching air, "O days of grief and desolation" was moving to the last degree, and in his final effort, "Ah me, what darkness," his power was splendidly displayed. The audience gave him a perfect ovation, and it would have been strange indeed if he had not received such, for the least appreciative could not have failed to be moved by such noble lines, so magnificently rendered.

Mr. Heinrich Meyn made an equally favorable impression, in his way. His baritone is of good quality, and he sang with grace and spirit. In the long recitative, "shall we submit to disgrace, we, Wodan's freeborn sons?" he had hard work to do, but he sustained it well to the end, not always with the greatest possible vigor, but never without good expression.

Miss Lena Little read her part satisfactorily, but she was vastly better in the descriptive than in the strongly dramatic passages, where she did not rise to equal the success of the men in their parts.

He would be an over-captious critic, however, who set out to pick flaws in a performance so excellent musically and so interesting and satisfying to the taste of the people. Only good words for all concerned were heard, at the conclusion of the performance, and though there had been no positive demand for a repetition of any part, it was not because the work had failed to please.

Symphony and Song.

The taste of the unmusical public for such things as the fourth Schumann symphony, which was the opening number of the Wednesday afternoon concert, is like that of most people for pickled lines—it has to be acquired. This fourth symphony is notable for the fact that the composer ran the movements together, and if it had not been for a photographer who created considerable commotion by taking a picture of the orchestra, at the close of the second movement, the people would have thought it was like Tennyson's brook. The orchestra did not play it in altogether glorious style, but it is not an altogether glorious thing to play.

The Tschaiakowsky number, two movements from the fourth symphony, in F minor, was much better. The andantino is full of light and shade, and the scherzo is as bright as can be. The use of the woodwind is marked for its excellent effect, and the modest part of the brasses, supplementing that of the strings and the woodwind, is productive of some charming measures.

Why the "Peer Gynt" suite has not before been played at a Festival concert does not appear, for it has been "standard" for some time, and is a most interesting composition—picturesque even to abruptness. The symphony orchestra is familiar with it, and would have no excuse for not playing it well. The ending was perhaps a little less satisfactory than it should have been, but it was very warm in the hall, that afternoon, and it was evident that the orchestra shared the general discomfort. If the players got somewhat tired, it is no great wonder.

The concerto for violoncello, in which Victor Herbert displayed his instrument to great advantage, is an interesting thing, quite Frenchy, calling for the best of technique and an artistic appreciation. These Mr. Herbert could be safely expected to give, and he did not disappoint his hearers. But it looks strange to see Mr. Herbert so nervous, for nervous he certainly was. He gripped the instrument with his right hand, and did not know what to do with his left. He shook himself out of his collar, and he looked appealingly down at the audience, and found great relief in a friendly smile which he bestowed upon some one whom he recognized. Mr. Herbert knows his instrument thoroughly, and his performance thereon is usually more interesting than his work as a conductor.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman followed the Schumann symphony with the air from "Don Carlos" Verdi's work entitled "O Fatal Gift." Her warmth of expression and her sweetness of voice made amends for the fact that she was not always quite equal to the song's demands. But she had a very winning way, and the audience called her back, which was not out of place. Then she sang a pathetic little song about a dead love, which Nevin entitled "At Twilight."

Mrs. Seabury C. Ford had a trying interruption while she was singing the "Bella mia fiamma, addio" aria of Mozart, in the way of a child's cry up in the chorus seats, which was unfortunate to the last degree, but, though Mr. Herbert stopped the performance in the very middle of it, Mrs. Ford did not lose her presence of mind nor falter in her song, but went on as if nothing had happened. She showed dramatic ability of a decidedly gratifying order though she was perhaps florid in expression at times. She came back in response to a welcome given in no uncertain way, and sang "Les Filles de Cadix," by Delibes, a piece in light and airy style, wherein she had another success.

The enthusiasm of the audience on this particular afternoon ought not to be unnoticed, for it was almost wholly made up of ladies, and their appreciation of or liking for the symphony work, of which there was a generous supply, was so strongly manifested as to be out of the ordinary, and their interest in the performance extended to the soloists, to all of whom they gave unstinted meed of applause.

A New Dramatic Work.

There is no warrant for repeating Dr. J. F. Bridge's "Repentance of Nineveh," unless it be so amended as to omit all after the title and supply new work. It is a grotesque thing, as an oratorio, for which the musical world will have very little use. It was given in Worcester, England, a year ago, and it was given in Worcester, Massachusetts, Wednesday; and that will suffice for the present. The audience squirmed under it, and well it might. Yet all this with such soloists as Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mrs. Carl Alves, Mr. Carl Duff and Mr. Herbert Johnson, all of whom sang their parts exceedingly well, and gave to the performance the only interest it possessed.

It would not do to say that it was wholly unsatisfactory the performance, that is because these ladies and gentlemen gave to it some artistic work wholly out of proportion to the merits of the thing. But it is almost too bad to ask Mme. Nordica to sing a part so little commensurate with her wonderful ability, though she knew how to put into her lines a beauty which was all her own.

Mrs. Carl Alves probably reads her music as well as anybody who will sing at the Festival. She is a modest little woman, and she made no splurge, but she exhibited qualifications for dramatic work which won her exceptional favor.

Mr. Carl Duff was a thoroughly satisfactory king, and sang his lines in a voice of great strength and purity. Mr. Herbert Johnson also sang his tenor part well.

The chorus work was satisfactory at some points and not so much so at others, but we forgive the chorus a good deal, considering what it had to do.

Praise must be accorded to Mr. E. N. Anderson's "distant chorus," the voices for which were mostly supplied by the swarth of the Ground Club. It was a delicate little work to do. Mr. Anderson always does such things well.

The orchestral scoring is frequently obscure, dull and not remarkable for any touch of appropriate sentiment.

We find very little use for "The Repentance of Nineveh."

But the first part of the program was as agreeable as was the latter part disappointing.

Wagner's coda to the Gluck overture from "Iphigenia in Aulis" makes it a dual work, and it is interesting and was well rendered.

The intermezzo from Mascagni's new opera, "Rustic Carnival," however, was the most delightful thing played during the day, and nobody has yet been found to quarrel with the composer's ideas of execution. It is interesting to know that this opera is to be given in Worcester, later in the season, at the theatre, by Emma Luch's full company, and if it sustains the promise of the intermezzo, it will be a taking thing. It seems as if a new star has already arisen on the horizon of Italian music. The intermezzo is played by the violins, with organ and harp parts, and occasionally the woodwind, judiciously introduced. It had never before been given in America, and is therefore entirely new to all listeners.

The dramatic scene of Rubinstein's "Hagar in the Desert," is a most exciting work for the contralto. Mrs. Alves showed great pathos and a wide range of voice. We do not wholly fancy the work itself, and doubt its great popularity. There is little but strenuous expression in it, and even the closing song of praise which Hagar raises for her deliverance does not dispel this impression. Mrs. Alves must be conceded to have sung this scene with an ability that drew the most out of it.

Mrs. Frank W. Ruggles, who has frequently lent valuable assistance at festival concerts, in taking incidental parts, sang the boy's part of Ishmael; and Mr. Carl Alves, whom the audience did not have the pleasure of seeing, sang the angel's part from behind the chorus.

We mention Mme. Nordica last, because she was the best, and because it is pleasant to leave a notice of this concert, thinking of her and her captivating songs. She was down for the exquisite waltz song of Gounod, "Ah, je veux vivre," and she sang it bewitchingly. She looked beautiful, too, and her smile was a symphony in itself. She is a down-easter, and used to be known to us as plain Lillian Norton. Her foreignized name does not take away her graciousness and her splendid presence. She warmed the cockles of every heart with the grizette-like dance of her song; and of course she had to sing again. Her second selection was recognizable to about everyone present who had ever heard any singing to mention. It was the dashing polonaise from "Mignon," and this also pleased the people greatly. Moreover, they felt so glad that she did not sing "Home, Sweet Home," the "Star Spangled Banner" or a selection from "Comrades." The encore notion of singing "The old songs" is evidently going by the board. Let it go.

A magnificent basket of roses, presented Mme. Nordica at the close of her song, showed what warm friends were listening to her singing. The name of the donor was not given, but the graceful compliment undoubtedly came from a Worcester gentleman whom Mme. Nordica has entertained in London.

American Composers.

The Thursday afternoon concert, dedicated to American composers, was pleasing in most respects, and commanded the enthusiasm of the hearers, not for its Americanism alone, although probably it was gratifying to many present to hear the eagle scream, but for the decided proofs of the existence of such a thing as American musical genius.

It would be unpardonable not to mention the MacDowell suite first of all. This beautiful composition, having four movements, was played for the first time, and the most critical will agree that it is destined to endure through a good many decades. It is certain to "wear well." It is highly imaginative, and the titles of the movements, "In the Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "Shepherdess Song," and "Forest Spirits" show what sort of fantastic utterance the composer here sought. The orchestra played this beautiful suite with a dash that would have delighted the composer, had he been present.

If Arthur Adams could have been called back from the higher world of song to which his spirit took its flight, a year ago, to hear the first performance of his Mass in C Minor, he would have realized how great his musical possibilities were. To the orchestral development of this work he gave great care, and made of it something different from most works of the kind. Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker, sure to be a favorite with a Worcester audience, sang the uplifting lines of the "Sanctus," with great fervor and sweetness, and had a reception that would have pleased almost anybody.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman sang her alto part with discretion and good taste. The male singers were Dr. G. R. Clark and Mr. Albert Lester King, who ought not to have had a whispered tete-a-tete during the performance.

Victor Herbert, as well as the audience, heard for the first time his new work, "The Captive," with full orchestra and chorus. The score of the "Captive" bristles with difficulties which the chorus had not succeeded in overcoming in such rehearsals as they had given the work. The orchestration has at times remarkable features, certainly new and, occasionally, ambitious to an alarming extent. But it is a work of which Mr. Herbert may feel proud, and when the orchestra and chorus have mastered it, he will not have to work as hard to lift them up to his ideal as he did on Thursday afternoon. We believe the general verdict would be in favor of its repetition at some time in the future.

Mrs. Seabury C. Ford sang the difficult soprano part with a faithful endeavor to do it justice and succeeded comparatively well. Mr. Carl Duffit's fine voice made the "Captive's" part one of the best features.

The new song of Whitney Coombs, "The Heavenly Message," won Mr. Duffit an encore, to which he responded with a German song of Lassen, "It was a dream," which was preferable to the first and much more "heavenly."

The Artists' Concert.

Worcester turned out in full array for the Thursday evening performance. That is always the case on artists' night, but there have been many artists' nights on which the measure of praise to be given the several performances must have been much less than in this case.

The audience was given a pretty good opportunity to say whether it liked Richard Wagner's music or not. It said with surprising acquiescence that it found Wagner quite to its taste, though it must be confessed that when the vivacious Del Puente sang the song from "Carmen," there was an exhibition of enthusiasm that was unmistakable in showing that after all, the "impressionist" pictures of Wagner were not as truly satisfactory to the people's taste as the less exalted notes of Bizet.

Beautiful Mme. Nordica, with her magnificent dress, which made the people's eyes stick out, and might just as well have had thousand-franc notes pinned on for trimming, so far as expense went, was regal in her manner, and she sang like a seraph. After the Handel air, "Let the bright seraphim," she sang the Rossini "Barber of Seville" air, "Una Voce," and then she went out with a storm of applause following her. The Festival has never had a more popular star than Nordica. It is partly due to her wonderful ability, and partly due to her fascinating manner. Her other single piece was "Senta's ballad," from the "Flying Dutchman," and this she sang with equal success.

Miss Lena Little went very evenly through her "Samson and Delilah" song, "My heart at thy sweet voice," and did not create any enthusiasm, which was not surprising. She would never have gotten her meshes about Samson long enough to shear his locks, with that kind of a song.

Del Puente, who sang the air, "Eri tu," from Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschero," ingratified himself with the audience, at once. He came up so confidently and with so satisfied an air, as much as to say, "Well, this is pleasant; isn't it?" and then he had such an irresistible way of leading Mme. Nordica off and on. Oh, Del Puente was the Romeo of that performance! Fortunately, his singing warranted the audience in continuing to feel pleased with him, and when he sang the Teodor song, he gratified the popular taste beyond question.

It was funny to hear people rave over Campanini, and talk about his "perfectly lovely" and "superb" singing. Campanini was not the real Campanini Thursday night. He was in poorer voice than on Tuesday evening, and he was too robust in tone. It was like one of William Ludwig's performances, when the great Irishman bellowed like a bull through "Nazareth." Campanini sang the "Lohegrin's Narrative," first, and a song from "Mignon" by way of encore.

In the trio, with Nordica and Del Puente, he had to thrust his thumbs into his waistcoat pocket in order to hold down that useful article of wearing apparel. Nordica and Del Puente sang against him with a determination not to be outdone. We do not believe there is any active demand for this sort of music.

Mr. Franz Wilczek, a graceful player, did a Vieuxtemps caprice, a Sarasate Gypsy Dance and the "Prize Song" from Die Meistersinger, with excellent effect.

The orchestra had for its number a "Faust overture" and a piece of Grieg, the Norwegian, and the program ended with the prayer and finale to "Lohegrin."

The Pianist's Concert.

The Friday afternoon concert has come to be that devoted to bringing out the notable pianists of the week. Yesterday afternoon was an unfortunate time for a concert of any kind, owing to the oppressive heat, and the close atmosphere of Mechanic's hall on a warm day is enough to lend terrors to any sort of performance to which people have quietly to listen.

Franz Rummel, who played the fourth concerto of Rubinstein, that in D minor, is one of the world's great pianists. A man of striking appearance, his simplicity of attire and presence is in contact to the "artistic" look which such people usually have. He played the three movements as though the day were Christmas and appeared to suffer less from the heat than any of those about him.

Marked by a soulfulness which artists who play only "show pieces" never manifest, and full of a fiery eloquence which now rose to wonderful strength and then fell to a subtle sweetness, his performance of the concerto became one of the very first events, in the order of praise, of the entire Festival. He struck his notes incisively and accentuated with wonderful clearness. His technique is exquisite.

Warm though it was, and tried as the audience was, after an overture and a four-movement symphony, it could not forego another

WORCESTER Saturday, Sept. 26 1891.

The newspapers, in speaking of our brilliant opening last Thursday, voluntarily voiced this characteristic truth---that "it was everywhere most apparent here that this store was the very embodiment, in the fullest sense, of that greatest element of success---"LIFE."

That's the word---LIFE.

No other word spoken so exactly expresses the spirit of this store.

LIFE is the greatest word in the commercial world.

LIFE means energy, vim, push, enterprise, culture and taste, advancement, and growth all in four letters.

There never was so much LIFE in this store as now; there isn't now so much LIFE in a store in town elsewhere.

The store appearance shows it; the improvements for our patrons' convenience mark it; the superb decorations silently evince it; the more varied and more beautiful goods than ever all over the house tell it; the matchless dress fabrics alone sustain it; the increasing trade attests it; the busy brains and bodies all about prove it; and every visitor speaks of it.

There isn't a spot here from top to bottom, from tin cups to carpets, but what now has more LIFE in it and about it, in every way, than ever---to say nothing of the hundreds, eye thousands of buyers here daily adding to it by their presence, and by their purchasing, their encouragement and their praise.

You should look at our window today---and you should take a walk over our store this week for above reasons? visitor to music festival or Worcesterite---buyer or looker---both welcome. YOUR LIFE will be brighter for it; and you may catch some---of ours.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

Worcester Polytechnic Institute.

The Institute has during the vacation received considerable additions to its equipment. In the Salisbury Laboratories has been set a new seventy horse-power upright boiler which will be used chiefly for heating, while the Babcock & Wilcox boiler can be employed exclusively for experimental work. The pier has been set in the steam-engineering room for a third engine which is nearly completed. A Thomson-Houston electric lighting plant has been purchased for the electrical engineering-room and several pieces of valuable apparatus, purchased abroad are now being set up. Considerable painting and varnishing of rooms, fixtures and furnishings have also been done.

The third week finds all the students at their post,---only one member of the Institute who was expected to return having failed to put in an appearance. The Senior Class members 36, the Middle 57, the Junior 81, and there are four more who are expected to join these classes at or before the middle of the year. F. E. Bradford and A. L. Rice of the last class are taking the course in electrical engineering. The total number of students is over 30 more than last year at this time. For all exercises except lectures in chemistry and physics, the Middle class is divided into three sections and the Junior into four. This gives divisions of about twenty throughout all classes. The reduction of the number, allowed the Mechanical Drawing Division, to twenty is a great improvement.

C. T. Tatman '93, and W. H. S., '89 has left the Institute, and will enter Harvard Law School in October, a step he has long contemplated. He was local editor of the W P I, vice-president of his class, and one of the most popular and prominent men in the school.

Football has taken a decided boom this Fall, and bids fair to carry tennis and general athletics along with it. The second day of school, a meeting was held and a Football Association, independent of the Athletic Association, was formed and the following officers elected. President, Southgate '92; vice-president Stark, '93; secretary pro tem, Cleveland '93; directors, '92, Alderman; '93 Hopkins; '94, Harris. No secretary or treasurer was elected from lack of time.

Heals, '85, formerly teacher in the Fall River High School, has been appointed instructor in mathematics.

The Senior class has completed organization for the next half year, as follows:---Pres. H. M. Southgate; vice-president G. F. Freed; secretary, F. E. Hammond; treasurer, E. L. Smith. C. A. Tucker was elected captain of the class foot-ball team.

About $80 was pledged on the spot to pay expenses, and subscription papers are to be circulated. At a meeting held Thursday noon, H. M. Southgate '92 was elected captain. The several classes have made up teams, and a series of class games is promised. From these players the Institute Eleven is to be made up. D. A. Bullard '93, Manager, intends to manage a series of games with the smaller colleges, those, here to be played on the Lake View Grounds. Practice is had every night on Bliss's field, and a strong effort is to be made to retrieve the old time reputation of the Tech.

The Y. M. C. A., of the Institute will give a reception in the Salisbury Laboratories, one week from Friday night to the members of the Junior class and their lady friends.

M. J. Leyden has resigned as editor-in-chief of the W P I, and with the loss of the local editor, C. T. Tatman, the board is left in a somewhat crippled condition. Four new editors are to be elected this Fall, one from '92, two from '93 and one from '94.

Wesleyan.

The college year opened Thursday, Sept. 17, at nine o'clock, the Freshmen class numbering about seventy. Recitations began on Friday and everything is now in running order.

There are several additions to the corps of instructors. Mr. F. H. Goodrich comes as instructor in Greek after a years study abroad, and Mr. Nicholson from Harvard as instructor in Latin. Mr. E. Rosa has been made associate Professor in physics and Mr. W. W. Daniels of Princeton instructor in political science. A new course in electricity has also been formed with Prof Rosa at the head. The large brick building back of North College has been fitted up and is to be used entirely for this course.

Great improvements have been made about the college grounds and many repairs in the buildings give the college property a much nicer appearance than last year.

Even thus early a great boom has taken place in Athletics. College meetings have been held and an entirely new set of rules adopted, which it is expected will put athletics at Wesleyan in a very high place.

Amherst.

Amherst opened the 17th of the month with about the same number of students to attendance as last year. The Freshman class numbers eighty three, a slight increase over the class of last year. There are also about ten additions to the upper classes. The first Saturday night of the term was suitably celebrated by a race rush between the two lower classes. The Freshman made a noble showing, but were outnumbered at the finish. No serious accidents marred the pleasure of the occasion.

The old "South" dormitory, under the generous provision of G. Henry Whitcomb, is being rapidly made into a very habitable building. It will be ready for occupancy about the middle of October.

High School.

The Major Henry Winn who is the gubernatorial candidate of the Peoples Party was once a teacher in the High School of this city. He has had a long and successful career as lawyer, business man and legislative.

Books and Bookmen.

None of the monthlies get the start of Ballou's in earliness of appearance. October is surely the name borne on the cover. As usual the contents are varied and material may be found to suit all tastes. The odds end at the end of the book i. e., the facetiae and the quaint and the curious are among the best features in the number.

Our Little Men and Women from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, Publishers.

A beautiful full page picture of the young Duchess has the place of honor on the first page of this number. A poem full of life is the Three Little Maids, and its illustrations are the life of it. There is a picture of the numerous children in the De Lesseps family, besides several full pages or almost full page illustrations in the book. The pretty story of Lady Gay has a portion, but the only way to satisfy the children is to begin with the first page and go through to the last. The price is $1.00 per year.

Babyland from D. Lothrop and Co., Boston, Publishers.

As usual the magazine is full of pictures of babies and animals, making it a perfect number for the little ones. The funny little poems are all illustrated so nicely that baby can almost read the story herself. The price of this dainty magazine is 50 cents per year.

By the kindness of Mr. W. Cruikshank, we are privileged to look through a spelling book, that long since, directed little Englishman in the way Orthographic. It is "Wogan's Improved Universal Speller" by Daniel Fenning. Its motto is:

"This education forms the tender mind;
Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined."

It is modeled much on the plan of the Webster's Speller which was the horror as well as the mentor of our grandparents.

Messrs. Henry Holt & Co., will shortly publish a new novel by Grant Allen "Recalled to Life." Its plot is peculiarly strange and startling.

The commotion made by the article on Gen. Sherman in a recent number of the Atlantic is quite likely to be repeated and intensified by an article on Gen. Thomas in the October number. It is by Colonel Henry Stone, who was a member of General Thomas's staff; and with natural pride he extols the genius and achievements of his chief, but not beyond the approval of those who were in the best position to judge of the singular greatness of Gen. Thomas's character and the importance of the work he did during the War. The article contains some strictures upon other officers who were very high in the service, and is not likely to escape criticism.

James Stillie, a veteran dealer in second hand books at Edinburg, says of Mr. Gladstone that on one of his last visits to his shop "he began to think he was buying too many of my scarce books, and, to the great amusement of Lord Rosebery, who was with him, he exclaimed, 'Gad, I must leave this shop, or I shall be ruined.'" Mr. Stillie began his apprenticeship as a bookseller with John Ballantyne, in 1816. One of his duties was to deliver proofs to Scott of Alabotsford. He recently said of Scott: "Some men are proud, but Scott was not like them; he had a kind word for everybody. He did not know what pride was. He spoke to me as if I was his equal. And he was a great man—a very great man; there'll never be his like again."

The Century has had in preparation for a year or two a series of illustrated articles on "The Jews in New York," written by Dr. Richard Wheatley. They deal with many phases of the subject, including occupations, festivals and feasts, family life and customs, charities, clubs, amusements, education, etc. Dr. Wheatley has gathered the materials for these papers in long and close study, and he has had the assistance of several well-known Hebrews.

The October Educational Review is the strongest number yet issued. Prof. James H. Blodgett, special agent of the Census for Statistics of Education, begins the interpretation of the Educational Statistics of the Eleventh Census; President Francis A. Walker argues for the higher appreciation of Schools of Technology; Prof. Herbert B. Adams traces the beginnings of University Extension in America; John T. Prince of Massachusetts, describes some of his recent experiences in the German schools. Other articles are by Professor Hanus of Harvard, Superintendent Aaron Gove of Denver, Dr. Larkin Duntun of Boston, Professor Hammer of Munich, and the editors. Important book reviews are by Sir William Dawson of McGill College, Montreal, Prof. B. I. Wheeler of Cornell, Prof. Garnett of the University of Virginia, Professors Hyslop and Jackson of Columbia, Professor Sanford of Stanford University, Superintendent Calkins of New York, and the editors. This issue also contains the full text of the great English act, known as the Elementary Education Act, 1891, which introduces free education on a large scale. This act ranks with the famous speech of the German Emperor (in the February number) as the most important educational documents of the year.

Old South Leaflets, Nos. 22-28, published by D. C. Heath & Co., Boston. 5 cents each.

This firm is continuing the good work, begun several years ago, under the editorial care of Mr. Edwin D. Mead, so well known as a careful student of history. Last week LIGHT published a full list of the monographs from 1 to 28 inclusive. Of these later numbers, it might be said No. 22, "Wheelock's Narrative," is an account of the original design, rise, progress and present (1762) state of the Indian Charity School in Lebanon, Conn., afterwards the foundation of Dartmouth College. No. 23, "The Petition of Right," takes us to England in the days, June 7, 1628, of Charles the First. No. 24, "The Grand Remonstrance," is also in the days of that unfortunate King, Dec. 1, 1641. No. 25, "The Scottish National Covenant," is of about the same Feb. 17, 1638. Adhesion to this League and Covenant caused many a gaping wound in those perilous times. No. 26, "The Agreement of the People," bears date, Jan. 15, 1648-9 just before the King lost his life. No. 27, "The Instrument of Government," Dec. 16, 1653; savors of Cromwell and his council. No. 28, "Cromwell's First Speech to the Little Parliament, July 4, 1653. This was otherwise known as Barbone's Parliament. Each leaflet is a picture in bright or somber colors of those days so famous in history. They are well edited.

Those who have seen the autobiography of Ben Butler so far as it is completed assert that it is full of spicy reading. The chapter of it which the New England Magazine for October, by special arrangement with the publishers, brings out in advance of the publication of the book, reveals the boyhood life of Butler. It contains illustrations of his early home, his mother, himself as a young man, Waterville College, which he attended. Read between the lines one cannot fail to see the influences which were working to bring out the Ben Butler of later years. He was the same Butler in boyhood that has been so prominent and progressive ever since.

Millbury.

The first meeting after the summer vacation of the Millbury Social Union occurred September 17, at the M. E. Church. Fully 75 persons sat down to a bountiful supper provided by the Epworth League as caterer. The Hon. J. H. Walker was the guest of the evening and spoke on "How to promote the business interest of our town."

The piano won by Will Windle has been on exhibition in J. H. Ferguson's window. Everybody pronounces it a beauty.

Miss R. Louise Nield of the Normal School is apprenticing at the Ledge street school.

Millbury must be becoming famous for the liberal education of her young people, 18 young men attending Worcester Academy; 2 entering Boston University School of Law, namely, T. H. Sullivan, W. H. S. '85 and J. C. '91. H. G. Hopkins W. H. S. '85, Dartmouth '91; Edgar Bartlett attending Becker's for short hand and Miss Eastman for bookkeeping, short-hand and typewriting.

The course of lectures of the M. E. Church will commence October 8.

A number from this town are attending the Music Festival.

The ladies, society of the Baptist church met with the Rev. A. M. Crane, Tuesday evening.

Camp 13 D. of V. was mustered last Friday evening by Dep't President Mrs. Walker. A public installation took place in the Town Hall, after which a very fine entertainment was given. The camp starts with the brightest prospects.

The ladies' society of the M. E., Church met Thursday evening, Mrs. Houghton and Van Ostrand being hostesses. A supper, musical and literary entertainment and social chat filled the evening.

The fire alarm has become self-acting and rings at will. Sunday evening about 10 o'clock people were startled to hear it ring. Mr. Sears, one of the engineers, says it is due to the influence of the electric lights. If so, it is about time it was fixed as sometime there will be a fire and people will think it is the "Electric light alarm."

Millbury is represented on the board of monitors at the academy by Charles Cook. Congratulations.

Old Boys.

For thirty years, the exiles had been smouldering and on Saturday last they burst into bright flames. It was in 1861, that the Excelsior Base Ball Club of Upton played the Mechanics of Worcester, and left the game a drawn one. Since then base ball, as well as the art of war, has been transformed. To play ball as it was formerly played here seemed almost a resurrection, but for the sake of the Old Men's Home and for the pleasure of seeing the game out, the survivors of both sides met on the Worcester Base Ball grounds last Saturday and had it out. Mr. William Lawrence of the Police Force had been the chief agent in reviving the old spirit and in getting the boys together. All the Worcester players were veterans while some of the Uptons, at the best, were sons of veterans. The names and ages of all were as follows: Wm. Lawrence, 61, captain; A. D. Putnam of Spencer, 40; W. H. Mason, 46; Hayes Leighton, Spencer, 46; H. E. Fayerweather, 47; E. F. Robinson, Spencer, 45; C. A. Mann, 44; D. H. Barnes, 50; M. A. Boyden, 47; O. F. Ballou, 41; H. E. Parsons, Spencer, 38; J. H. Walker, 43; G. A. Norcross, 52; Winslow M. Harrington, 49; substitutes, Jack Spring, 55; Samuel Barnes, 48.

The Excelsiors put into the field: Geo. H. Stoddard, 58, captain; Geo. E. Childs, 49; Albert Davis, 49; J. W. Tall, 64; James Gorham, 23; E. M. Baker, 26; Alonzo Southland, 40; George R. Pierce, 44; D. A. Farrington, 51; C. J. Fishbe, 36; George A. Wood, 45; J. H. Bowen, 31; Myron Forbush, 40; Ed. Aldrich, 29; substitutes, John Hines, 34; W. H. Wellington, 44.

The game began at 3 p.m. and lasted one hour and a half, ending with a tally of twenty-five to nine in favor of the Uptons. While the attendance was not so large as might have been expected, enough tickets had been sold to net something for the home. Many an onlooker hoped that the old Massachusetts game might be revived.

J. L. Hibbard acted as referee; Hon. Chas. G. Reed was judge for the Mechanics, and W. H. Wellington acted in the same capacity for the Excelsiors.

At the banquet, which followed in the evening at the Bay State, it is safe to say that the Worcester club scored as many points as did their visitors. The afternoon exercises had given all most excellent appetites and they made way with Landlord Douglass' spread in short order. General Manager Lawrence was at the head of the table and, after the feast, directed the speaking. He congratulated the Upton club on the victory and hoped to see the old game revived. He then introduced Mr. George H. Stoddard of Upton as a member of the old Excelsiors, who extolled the round ball game in glowing terms and read a letter from Mr. Knowlton of Upton, the famous manufacturer, who has not abated a jot of his old liking for the game. Illness prevented his presence. Alfred S. Roe of Worcester spoke next, recalling some memories of the old game and the introduction of the new. H. E. Parsons of Spencer read a series of letters more than thirty years old bearing on the game. Interesting remarks were made by George Wood of Upton, Hazel Leighton of Spencer, W. H. Wellington of Upton and Mason Boyden of Worcester. With a vote of thanks for Mr. Lawrence, the meeting broke up. Whether the Massachusetts game is ever revived or not, the day was well spent and was fragrant with reminiscence.

Emmet Guards.

This has been a great week for the Guards. They began the same by a trial shoot at Framingham, Monday, and in the evening their great fair in Father Mathew Hall commenced. Owing to their careful management, the attendance was very large from the beginning and the results all that could be wished.

A Street-Car Romance.

How the Loss of a Purse led a Young Man to Matrimony.

"Tickets!" shouted the smart young conductor, as he bowed his way through the passengers standing in a car which was being drawn swiftly up California Street.

It was about half-past five o'clock on a Thursday afternoon that I found myself inside a car filled with men returning from business, scattered among whom was a sprinkling of members of the fairer sex, who, incumbered with their innumerable purchases and wrapped up in cloaks, allowed only the tips of their noses to appear over their long boas of fur or feathers. It was one of those cold, foggy evenings that make pedestrians hurry along at top speed, while the policemen at the corners of the streets tramp up and down to keep themselves warm. The ladies seemed to have great difficulty in bringing their purses out from their small muffs or from their deep pockets, and a continuous string of apologies was offered for involuntary elbowings, caused by endeavors of their benumbed hands to obtain bold of the nickels for their fares.

"Why, where is my purse? You haven't got it, have you, Ethel?" exclaimed a sweet voiced lady of middle age, after a hasty search in her muff and a lengthy exploration of the mysterious depths of her handsome gown.

"No, ma'am."

"Then some one must have stolen it, or, perhaps, I have left it in some of the shops—down at the White House, probably."

All eyes were turned in the direction of the lady who had spoken, and the conductor began to look very knowing.

"Haven't you got any money?" he demanded, in a gruff tone.

"No; I have lost my purse, which contained all the money I have about me. But my husband will pay for us in the morning, or I will send the money to the office at once on returning home."

"Can't do it, ma'am," replied the conductor; "you've got to pay now or get out and walk."

"Here, conductor," I said, tendering him a dime; and then, turning to the elderly lady, I added: "It is the rule of the company, madam. The conductor can not give credit to passengers. I hope you will permit me to spare you annoyance of having to get out at this hour."

"I am very much obliged to you, sir," replied the lady, "and I accept your kind offer willingly. Will you be good enough to give me your address, that I may discharge without delay this small debt?"

"Oh, it is a mere nothing, madam," I said; "I shall be very well satisfied if you will give the sum to the first poor person you meet."

"Oh, no, not at all, sir, I must insist—" Under such pressure, I could hardly refuse, and as the car was now approaching Hyde street, where I transferred to the cross-town line, I took the three transfers the conductor gave me, and, confused by the deep interest of the other passengers, now all eyes and ears, I hastily drew out a card, and, raising my hat, extended it, with two transfers to the lady.

But it was the young girl who, blushing deeply, took them.

The following day I had almost forgotten the incident, when among my letters, I found one—in an unknown hand—writing—bearing the city post-mark. I opened it and saw, attached to the top corner of the visiting card inclosed, five two-cent stamps. On the card was printed:—

MR. AND MRS. JOHN G. CARMAN.

While underneath was written:

Mr. and Mrs. Carman present their compliments and thanks to Mr. Paul, Barnard for his kindness and civility, on Tuesdays. No.—Pine Street.

I put the card aside on my desk, under a vase of violets, and it was not till one morning, nearly a week, latter that I came across it again.

Now, every day you meet people in a street-car whom you look at for an instant with more or less attention; but in my case, I had hardly had a glimpse of the mother or the daughter, and had not even the least idea if they were pretty or otherwise. From their accent and manner, however, there could be no doubt they were of the upper world—but, after all, of what interest could they be to me?

Nevertheless, I did feel interested, so why should I attempt to deny it? Their address had been given to me, and also their day at home. The address was printed, but "the day" was written in a modern, angular English hand. Not so the lines of thanks, the handwriting there was the delicate, precise kind that young misses were taught thirty years ago. The mother had certainly written them.

But who had written "the day"?

I became curious. How could I find out? Yes, there was a way. . . . But to call on people with whom I had only exchanged a few words, almost on the street, and who, in a week, might have forgotten both my name and face, was rather a delicate matter. Then I should have to undergo the torture of feeling myself an intruder, as the servant would announce me in the reception-room where, perhaps, half-a-dozen ladies, unknown to me, would look me over from head to foot as I advanced, as if to ask: "Who is this person and where does he come from?"

When I thought it well over, however, I reflected that there had been occasion to talk of me, and, at the name of Paul Barnard, Mrs. Carman would know very well who I was. At all events, I determined to renew the acquaintance, and so the following Tuesday found me at the door of No.—Pine Street.

I must confess I did feel rather uneasy when my inquiry "Mrs. Carman?" brought the answer: "Yes, sir; shall I take your coat, sir?" and I was presently ushered into a handsomely furnished room, where I proceeded to pull myself together while awaiting Mrs. Carman.

* * * * *

Since then some months have passed.

"Paul, what are you writing there?"

"A little story, darling."

"Let me see."

"No, no—no yet."

But she looked over my shoulder, and a small hand soon covered my eyes, while an arm slipped round my neck and her soft lips pressed mine.

"Oh, you naughty boy? But just wait a minute."

She disappeared, laughing, and came back quickly with a pink satchel, from which she drew out two pink street-car transfers.

"You see, I've kept them safely—you did not think I had thrown them away, dear? The first Tuesday I cried all night. If you had not come the second—"

"Well, what would you have done, Ethel?"

"Shall I tell you?"

"Yes, do."

"You won't be cross? Well, I would have sent you one of them by post."

"How jolly! And Mrs. Carman knew—"

"No, no no! She was ever so surprised when you called. It was I who, before closing the envelope, secretly wrote at the foot of the card "Tuesdays." Are you sorry?"

(And then there is the sound of the kissing).

Boston Letter.

BOSTON, Sept 15, 1891.

Since my last letter the regular theatrical season has commenced and is now in good running order, with every prospect of a good paying year. So at least all the managers report, and you would judge so yourself were you to take a stroll up Washington street, in the vicinity of theatre row or in the neighborhood of the other theatres and see the brilliantly lighted entrances, the sidewalks filled with a gay crowd on amusement bent, while the cars, and all varieties of public and private carriages help swell the throng.

There is a kind of undesirable excitement in it all that is quite frequently as interesting as the play itself. This is all the more noticeable if one has been out of town on a vacation and all at once finds himself again in the procession of city life. We Americans pay out more for amusement than any other nation in the world and we must have it in our own nervous way, too, as a rule, or we are not satisfied and many times not then. Anything for a change.

You hear family men growling, at the heavy expenses at the sea-shore or in the country and they return home with a bit of relief only to find innumerable theatres and concerts and operas inviting them to bring forth their hard earned ducats. They may come high but we must have them.

We are having an era of the realistic farm drama in town at present in the shape of the "Old Homestead" and the "County Fair."

Of course you all remember our old friend "Josh Whitcomb" so long played by Denman Thompson, well he is now running the "Old Homestead" at the Boston Theatre, in the same true touch of nature that kept it in favor with the New Yorkers for several years and promises a phenomenal run here. At the Park Theatre Neil Burgess is to give the "County Fair" the entire season, and seats may be obtained for eight weeks ahead. It looks now from the excellent business that all they anticipate will be fully realized and that the Hul will extend its long continued hearty greeting as New York did. No expense has been spared in either play to make as real a picture of country life as possible with the haymows and the cattle and the grain in the barn, and the horse race at the county fair. Everything connected with the plain, homely, honest farm life is given so vividly that you almost think you are back on some old farm of the old Granite state.

There is something more than even the good acting of the respective stars that holds and draws these large audiences night after night: when many an emotional society drama goes to the wall. The people are brought near to a natural, honest, moral, rugged life, to scenes and conditions many a person in front of the foot-lights has experienced in early life, so that, after all the, moral line on the stage does count and "one touch of Nature makes the whole world kin."

The Museum opened with "Ye Earlie Troubles" by Henry Guy Carleton, a New York author, and it has met with a very good reception, as good as anything given there for for sometime. The company is practically the same it was last year, the new members had not very prominent parts, but the entire company appeared to good advantage especially Miriam O'Leary who perhaps carries off the honors. Miss Emma Sheridan, formerly leading lady, is now playing with Mansfield in New York. Her place here is taken by Miss Campbell, a very intelligent actress.

Hoyt's "Texas Steer" is having a good time at the Tremont Theatre. All his pieces do well here, where he is known as an ex-Boston newspaper man. His pieces are invariably bright and witty, lots of snap and go, with catchy music and pretty girls. "Blue Jeans" at the Hollis is an old attraction, that too gives considerable of country life. "The Power of the Press" at the Globe as you might expect is mighty and will prevail.

Most of the sea shore resorts are closed—or ought to be. Some always hate to go, and almost wait until they need ulsters and seal skins. Really though, September, if not too cool, is about the best month you can have for an outing and if you hit upon a place that combines the country and the shore you sometimes don't know when to leave, but I will stop here.

Judge — "How far did the thief carry your pig?" Complainant — "Fully two miles away from my house." Judge (to prisoner) — "What have you to say to this charge?" Prisoner — "It was only a joke, Judge." — "Six months— you carried the joke too far." — "Fie—gone."

"Forty-Second" in Leicester.

This regiment was made up of companies from such remote sections of the state that full meetings of its survivors are not common. The Eastern portions reunite at Downer's Landing in mid-summer; Medfield has its annual gatherings and the Worcester County representatives have regularly met somewhere near Worcester or in the Western portion of the county. The completion of the Electric railway to Spencer opened the way to Leicester nicely, so on Thursday, Sept. 17, above one hundred veterans, accompanied by members of their families, repaired to that historic town to fight their battles over again and spend a few hours in social pleasure.

The town hall was thrown open to them and under the presidency of Deacon James Miller of North Brookfield, the reunion proceeded. The hall was well filled by people to whom a gathering of veterans means much. After all, the routine meeting is not what calls the "Boys" together. Officers are elected pro tempore on the report of a committee. Col. Jos. A. Titus of Worcester was designated as the comrade to present a historic sketch for reading at the next gathering. A committee reported the following names as those of officers for next year, President, H. O. Sawyer of West Brookfield; vice-presidents, Mason A. Boyden, C. H. Allen, S. S. Denny; secretary, Charles S. Knight; treasurer, George Mann; executive committee, J. E. Bigelow, Henry Converse, A. Knight, J. C. Eaton, J. W. Howe, M. A. Aldrich, G. L. Stone, C. P. Barton, James Miller.

Before dinner, as there was a little time unoccupied by business, the president called up on Major F. G. Stiles of this city. Apparently his listeners knew that the Major always said something good, for they accorded him the closest attention while he recalled scenes and events of nearly thirty years ago. Every word of the speaker was appropriate and most happily given. His thoughts of the regiment and its history led up admirably to a poem by Col. John Hay on those who fell in the strife.

At the beat of the drum, by the one who was once the "Drummer Boy," a line was formed, stretching away from the hall to the Leicester Hotel, where Landlord Ciddings had prepared a sumptuous repast. It is doubtful whether his spacious edifice ever held a happier or hungrier throng than that which sat around his tables on that day. But even the hungriest cannot always eat and when the culinary rattle ceased, President Miller rapped to order and introduced as the first speaker Gen. Isaac S. Burrill of Roxbury, the old Colonel, an officer who suffered eighteen months imprisonment, an ordeal that blanchied his hair and brought on age, years before its time. The General was sure of his footing in that company and every ear was in full accord with every word and sentiment of the venerable gentleman. He was generously applauded.

For the first time at these annual gatherings the Lt. Col. Dr. Joseph Stedman of Medfield was present and many hand shakes were had in memory of New Orleans and points even further South. The Colonel digressed into a bit of history as to a certain 4th of July parade in the Crescent city, revealing that it was for the purpose of overawing the stalwart Rebels who had contemplated an uprising. The years have dealt very kindly with Dr. Stedman and his presence and reception were alike cordial and pleasant.

Adjutant C. A. Davis of Roxbury followed, and was rejoiced at meeting his old fellow soldiers. Captain Cogswell might have felt that the day was gotten up on his account for the honors of the day certainly were his in the matter of introduction and greeting. His remarks were mainly retrospective, dealing with the men who had followed him to the field. It is evident that the Captain fills a large space in the hearts and memories of the 42d. Alfred S. Roe of Worcester excused his presence, as he was not a veteran of this regiment, on account of his friendship for Major Stiles and his respect for all assemblages of old soldiers.

The Rev. A. H. Coolidge of Leicester, who had said grace at the beginning of the dinner spoke in a happy strain of the scenes when the Leicester Company was raised and Captain Cogswell started the list. N. E. Converse of Co. E expressed an earnest wish to prepare and preserve all possible records of the men. Lieut. Duncan and E. F. Carpenter happily escaped making speeches by passing the labor along to some one else. Mason Boyden of Worcester spoke of visiting recently scenes identified with the past of the 42d. J. F. Kehler spoke briefly and Mrs. D. E. Denny of Worcester, spoke feelingly of her recollection of the far away days. Frank Smith produced an old diary and read passages from it descriptive of his experience while Comrade S. Bothwell recalled some pleasant memories associated with Colonel Burrell. It was past three p.m. when the veterans adjourned to the parlors and made ready to go home. Here are some of the names of those who enjoyed the day: President James Miller, Gen. I. S. Burrell, Lieut. Col. Joseph Stedman, Maj. Fred G. Stiles and wife, Adjutant Charles A. Davis, Capt. J. D. Cogswell and wife, Col. J. A. Titus, W. H. Montague and wife, F. R. Dame, N. E. About Folks.

The Worcester Oxygen Company which has its office at 368½ Main Street, corner of Elm, in the Lincoln Block, is now prepared to furnish its patrons with home treatments. Many persons who find it inconvenient to call at the office will undoubtedly appreciate this opportunity. Dr. J. W. Gould and T. D. Bristol, M. D., the proprietors, are well pleased with the success of the company. The Oxygen is prepared fresh every day and administered according to the requirements of the condition of the patient by an experienced physician, thus securing the best possible results to be attained from a combination of nature and science.

Comrade James K. Churchill, Senior Vice Commander of the G. A. R. Department of Massachusetts is having his time pretty well occupied in visiting Camp Fires and the Fairs. October 5th, he will be in Fall River, Fitchburg the 12th and in Oxford the 14th. All G. A. R. Fairs.

James S. McKeon, late of Holy Cross College, about departing for Montreal was presented, last Sunday, with $50.00 in gold by his associate altar boys of St. Anne's Church.

Birthdays are always in LIGHT's way and that of the Davis Art Company comes this week. Just one year of life and the cat that ate the canary with expanded face stands in the advertising column to express the proprietors satisfaction. "I have eaten the Canary" is an old cut and it is a stroke of genius.

Caleb Wall's lecture in Tatnuck is again postponed till October 3d.

Every one interested in the lecture of Joseph Cook must bear in mind that he will give his "Seven Modern Wonders" in Association Hall, October 26, for the benefit of Hope Church.

Dr. J. P. Rand and wife have returned from a two weeks' pleasure trip through Massachusetts and New Hampshire and report an enjoyable time. Mrs. Rand is much improved in health.

Don't fail to read Daniel A. Howe's advertisement of teas and coffee. During the summer, his long established place of business has been wonderfully improved. The old Waldo Block so far as this store is concerned, seems completely transformed. The floor has been lowered nearly two feet, enabling him to better display his large collection of household goods. In the rear of the room a fine office has been arranged, but Mr. Howe is not much of an office merchant. He is out and doing. No better nor more extensive assortment of teas and coffee can be found in this city. To fully appreciate the changes that have been made in the store, one should call and see for himself.

Mrs. Helen DeCamp of the W. C. T. U., one of the tireless workers who keep the world moving reported one week ago to the Union results of the Fair enterprise and was presented with a fine portrait of Miss Frances E. Willard.

Breakfast Vanities

BY MRS. DEARBORN,
Principal Boston Cooking School.
Mix and sift together 1 pint pastry flour, $\frac{1}{2}$ tea sp. salt and 1 heaping tea sp. Cleveland's Baking Powder. Mix to a stiff dough with milk, using only sufficient to make it stiff enough to roll. Toss out on a slightly floured board, roll out very thin, cut into small squares with a sharp knife or pastry wheel and drop into boiling lard.

Shake the kettle gently to facilitate their rising, and when well puffed up turn them and brown the other side. Drain on paper. They should be cooked in fat hot enough to brown a piece of bread while counting sixty, and are quite hollow when cooked. Serve with maple syrup if liked.—(Copyright, 1891.)

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Pure crystal cream of tartar and soda make a perfectly wholesome leaven. There is no other leavening power in Cleveland's Baking Powder.

Good to Eat.Fruit Ginger Bread.

One cupful of molasses, one-half cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of butter, one cupful of stoned raisins, one-half cupful of water, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in the water, one egg, one teaspoonful of ginger, two and one-half cupfuls of flour a pinch of salt.—Advocate.

Corn-Flour C. esse-Cakes.

To one pint of milk and one ounce of corn-flour add four well-beaten eggs and a quarter of a pound of sugar. Put these in an enameled sauce-pan on the fire, and bring it up to a boiling-point. Flavor with essence of lemon. Line some patty pans with puff paste, pour in the above custard, dust sugar over them, and bake.

Delicious Sponge Cake.

Beat the yolks and whites of two eggs separately, and mix nearly all of one cup of sugar with the whites, the rest with the yolks. Add one cup flour, one generous teaspoon baking powder, and one-quarter teaspoon salt. After mixing all these well together, add one-half cup of boiling water.—Boston Budget.

Rice, boiled very dry, is acceptably served with fish instead of potatoes.—Boston Budget.

Creamed Rice.

Steam a cupful of rice in two cupfuls of milk till the grains are tender and have absorbed the milk; let it cool, then add a cupful of whipped cream flavored with vanilla or lemon extract, and stir into the rice. If it is in the season when the berries are ripe, substitute for the flavoring extract crushed and sweetened strawberries or raspberries; and when served very cold in a pretty dish, it is a nice dessert.

Rice Cube.

Mould the plain boiled rice in a form that can be cut in half inch-thick slices like bread; between each slice of the cold rice spread a layer of bright jelly, and pile until you have half a dozen layers of red and white. Serve cold, with cream and sugar.—Housekeepers' Weekly.

Crisped Bread.

There were several slices of stale bread and some crusts. These were spread in a pan and put in a very hot oven for ten minutes. In that time they became brown and crisp, and were delicious with the hot chocolate. Broken rolls, crusts and slices of bread never go begging in our house. Sometimes they are made crisp in the manner described; sometimes dipped in cold water, spread in a pan and put in the hot oven for about ten minutes, when they are taken out, buttered and served very hot; again, they are toasted, dipped in boiling water and buttered, and served very hot; or, if they are not used for luncheon, they are dried slowly in the warm oven, put in a canvas bag and pounded, are then sifted through the flour sieve, and bottled for use in bread-making. Sometimes, in summer they are crisped in a moderately hot oven, and then crushed on a board with a rolling-pin, poured in to a deep dish, and served with bowls of milk for luncheon, or on Sunday evenings for supper.—Good Housekeeping. A Great Festival.

piece. Then he played a "Nocturne" of Louis Brassin, a dainty, tender little piece which made life seem once more worth living, to the perspiring listener.

The accompaniment was for the most part intelligent, though sometimes it had a "wilted" effect in the tempo.

Other than this, the program was chiefly for the orchestra.

Drorak's symphony, No. 2, in D minor, has four movements, of which the second is most interesting, the phazo much less so, and the finale crisp and pleasing.

The "Egmont" overture is chiefly pleasing for the triumphant ending. The orchestra certainly did not put a great deal of spirit into it, and a change in the program was not welcome.

Dr. G. R. Clark's solo was Gounod's recitative, "Yes, she flies from me still," and the air, "She alone charmed my sadness," from "Irene." Dr. Clark's performance was not above the commonplace, and the audience had not the spirit to give him a recall for the sake of a compliment alone.

The other soloist was Mrs. Seabury C. Ford. This was her last appearance and the bolero poem the "Sicilian Vespers" was suited to her voice and method more thoroughly than anything she had previously sung. Her encore was a rather foolish thing, not worth the powder on such a hot day,—"Dear, when I look into their eyes."

There was quite an awakening over Salo's Rhapsody in A, a french composition by a Spaniard. Both movements are brim full of catchy phrases and brilliant coloring. The triangle the harps, and minor instruments are made to do service in carrying out the composer's idea. The orchestra seemed troubled by a trifling uncertainty among the things,—but the woodwind harmony was complete and as a whole there was little fault to be found.

That portion of the audience which deserted before the Rhapsody made a mistake.

The Closing Oratorio.

When Mr. Zerrahn came upon the platform, to direct the last performance of the week, he was greeted by a burst of applause, a waving of handkerchiefs by the ever loyal chorus and a twanging of strings by the orchestra, all of which he accepted with manifestations of pleasure. But the surprise in store for him a little later was a more enduring testimonial to the good-will of the people with whom he has been so long associated in the work of the Worcester Festival.

At the close of the intermission, when Mr. Zerrahn rapped for attention, President Edward L. Davis walked upon the platform and made one of those timely speeches which he so well knows how to make, speaking of the love and regard in which Mr. Zerrahn is held by one who know him, and referring to the fact that this was his 25th year of directorship of the Worcester Festival. Then he handed him an envelope.

Mr. Zerrahn was greatly moved. His first effort at a speech in reply was hardly audible; but he did make out to speak to the people, to the chorus and to the orchestra. It was a charming thing in every way.

The envelope contained a check for $1500.

The Festival closed with a performance of selected parts of Handel's noble oratorio, "Israel in Egypt." More might have been given, but there had been a surfeit of lengthy programs before, and it was too warm a night to contemplate drawing the program out larger than it was.

The orchestration of this oratorio is half its glory. Strains of wondrous beauty accompany the words throughout, and, rightly sung and played, it is one of the really great oratorios.

The chorus sang well last night, and gave little cause for criticism. In such beautiful work as the chorus, "But as for his people," it excelled, and the chorus was not once divided against itself, as it has been known to be on other occasions.

"I will sing into the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously, and "The Lord shall reign for ever and ever," were done about as well as any body of singers could be asked to do them.

Mrs. Alves sang her alto parts with good expression, and maintained the reputation for which she has established.

Mrs. Jennie Patrick Walker's clear, strong soprano was heard to great advantage in the recitative, "Thrice happy Israel" and the concluding solo with chorus, "Sing ye to the Lord."

A biking for Mr. Herbert Johnson in Oratorio is apt to grow upon the faithful listener. The range of his smooth tenor voice is exactly suited to such work as that in the "Israel," for example, and Mr. Johnson seems to have the Oratorio spirit. As long as he displays that, it will not much matter whether he is stocked with the trinkets of the profession, or not.

He sang the air, "The enemy said," and his recitative, "Now there arose a new King" with careful attention to the details, and produced a general effect as pleasing as could well be asked.

Myron W. Whitney, bass, which may be perhaps be called "standard" for oratorio, was heard in the virile lines, "God, looking down, confounded all their host," and Mr. Carl Duffit's strong voice lent valuable aid in the duet, "The Lord is a man of war."

This concert was certainly an acceptable finale to the week of song. It was not quite like giving "The Messiah" or the "Elijah" in complete form, but to do that with the "Israel" was out of the question. The selections were made by no careless hand, and the cutting of the work was done with good judgement.

There was little of which to speak complainingly, on this final night of the week's music, and it must be said that it was a harmonious and satisfactory ending.

To place the thirty-fifth Festival in advance of the one whose spirit is now a matter of history, its moving works will need to begin early and work late.

O'Meara—O'Neil.

Monday morning, at St. John's Church, by the Rev. Thomas Griffin, Dr. M. J. O'Meara was married to Miss Mellie E. O'Neil. In the sanctuary were Rev. Dr. Thomas J. Conaty, Revs. Dennis Scannell, Eugene F. Brosini, Han. C. M. Foley, M. T. O'Brien and Wm. T. Finneran. A large number of friends and relatives were present who were seated by the following ushers: Edward J. McMahon, John J. Murphy, Dr. Wm. J. Delehanty, Dr. M. F. Fallon, Thomas H. Hall and John F. O'Connor, principal of the Blackstone High School.

Dr. John A. Carroll was best man and Miss Lillie O'Neil, a sister, was bridesmaid. Among those witnessing the ceremony were Andrew Athy, Dr. J. H. Kelly, W. J. O'Halloran, Dr. M. V. O'Callaghan, Mrs. James Carroll and family, Dr. T. A. Purcell, and Dr. Mahoney of Holyoke, Dr. P. J. Finnegan and wife of Cambridge, Dr. Charles Cahill of Cambridgeport, Miss Eva Lucier of Nashua, N. H., Dr. W. F. Gleason of Providence, John W. Ferguson of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Wall of Marlboro.

A reception followed at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Catharine O'Neil, 15 Vernon Street, and Zahonyi furnished a wedding breakfast.

He was a musician but not one of the big class to shine in the Festival, but just a little away off twinkler and he was blind, but he could play the picolo and that shrill pipe he kept in action, which the crowd surged to and fro, almost jostling him off the walk, while they sought the Hall. Between his knees was a small zither which he played while the pipe rested. LIGHT wonders how many pennies the premium paying Festival goers dropped into his gaping box. After all fine concerts are not appreciated.

LIGHT knows a young man who seemed, following an evening out, to be oppressed by melancholy. To anxious inquiries as to the cause, his only response was, "How do you expect a fellow to look when there was only one boy and six girls!"

A symphony in yellow was one of Whistler's trump's; but Barnard & Sumner's north window, during the past week has had a symphony in all the colors of the rain-bow. The ladies spent so much time regarding it that some missed the rehearsals in Mechanics Hall. The designer is a first class artist.

Friends of Volapuk:

With the coming of the fall and winter months, renewed activity is manifest among those who feel that they are doing God's good work when endeavoring to bring the world to a larger knowledge of that international tongue which will result in a closer union in all things, of the nations of the world. To the scientific it is promise of a wider diffusion of truth, to the Christian, an extension of the Christianizing means, to the hater of war, a new and powerful promoter of his race, an element which binds in the close bonds of brotherhood the nationalities of the earth.

We ask the assistance of all who believe in the future. Fee of admittance to our Worcester Club is one dollar; fee to the National Club is the same, and all members receive the official organ giving all the news of the movement. I would be glad to receive names for one or both these organizations. It is the way of all reforms to require self-sacrificing efforts on the part of those who open their hearts to it. The world does not run to new things, anything good must be forced upon it, and it is even so with Volapuk, although it has made the most wonderful growth heretofore without particular effort of its adherents.

Friday Populars.

At the close of one musical festivity comes the announcement of another treat for Worcester people, in the Friday Popular. Daniel F. Gay has secured for the coming winter, a course of ten entertainments made up of excellent artists and well varied. It is surprising that the price for so fine a course can be placed so low as $1.50 for the ten. But whatever the price, there is no mistaking the fact that the talent is first class. The management does not plan to sell any single evening tickets.

There will be a preliminary concert Oct. 23 and all those attending this will receive a check entitling them to choose the next day a seat for the full course. The sale will not be open to the public till Oct. 26th. Thus those attending the preliminary concert will be assured of a good seat.

Further information can be obtained from a twenty-four page prospectus to be had of C. L. Gorham & Co., who will sell the tickets for the course.

Lothrop's Opera House.

It is almost superfluous to say any longer that the plays at this popular theater draw crowded houses every evening, for it has been said so often within the past few weeks that it is now taken for granted. The melo-drama, "Mardo," has been the attraction this week. "There are many exciting scenes and incidents, which afford opportunity for the display of much artistic work, both by the actors and in the scenery, which bears so important a part in the modern play. Justin Paige and Miss Kate Glassford assumed the leading parts and succeeded in winning very generous applause. The one-act comedy which preceded the drama was exceedingly funny. It was entitled "Poor Pillioddy." This afternoon and evening the last performances will take place.

Next week the stock company of which Miss Ethel Tucker is leading lady, will return. The five act drama "49" is the name of the play to be presented. Tickets for all performances on sale one week in advance.

A Well Known Restaurant.

There are many excellent restaurants in this city, but it is doubtful if one can be found better equipped with everything pertaining to a first class eating-house, than the cozy little dining hall at No. 32 Southbridge Street, which is owned and managed by Mrs. L. Benedict. It is situated but a short distance from Main street and is easy of access from all directions. Meals can be obtained at all hours. Strangers visiting this city will be amply repaid by giving this place a visit. Mrs. Benedict makes a specialty of catering to table boarders. The successful business established is well deserved.

Richard Healy will have no formal opening this year, but he is prepared at any and all times to show the latest styles in cloaks, jackets and capes. He now has his full winter stock in place. For variety and for quality, it is undoubtedly excelled by no other to be found in the city. An excellent idea of what will be "the correct thing" in wraps this winter, can be obtained by giving Mr. Healy a call.

TOO MUCH

Cannot be written in praise of "B. & H." and "Rochester" Central Draft Lamps. We place them upon the same level. We have sold these makes since they were first made. We know them to be RIGHT in every way.

THE PIONEERS

In any new and radical departure from old ideas, if their theories prove correct, always have imitators. How often are their productions as good as the original and genuine?

SO IT IS

With Central Draft Lamps. Imitations of the Rochester are numerous. Dozens of their imitators have failed to succeed, dozens more will, and still other dozens will doubtless fill their places.

EACH YEAR

Some NEW WONDER built upon ideas stolen from the "Rochester" or "B. & H." is heralded far and wide. The strongest claims are made for it. Many are sold. People are disappointed. Cry out against it. Its manufacture is stopped.

WHO IS INJURED?

The consumer, as usual, takes the loss. Look at any discarded lamps. You will find all sorts of names upon them, but the "Rochester" or "B. & H.," never.

WE SELL YOU

The "Rochester" or "B. & H." Other people do the same. There might be more money to us in an "Exclusive Sale" of some one of the other sorts that we could control. We prefer to sell the best, as with everything else.

THE ADVANTAGE

That comes to you from buying at this store is. You have the ENTIRE line of both makes from which to make your selection. The prices are based upon the cost. Our large buying of these two best of lamps brings the smallest possible price.

IF YOU BUY

"Rochester" or "B. & H." of ANYONE you are SURE of a good thing. Any other sort uncertain.

THE CLARK-SAWYER Co.

Household.

It should be borne in mind that headache may arise from internal eye troubles, and all cases which resist well-directed medication should be sent to an oculist for examination.

Kerosene poured on red flannel and bound on the throat will greatly ease a sore throat. It will also heal cuts and cure chillsains.

A good illustration of the injurious effects on the sick of deprivation of sunlight is given by Dr. Hammond in his treatise on hygiene. He says: "I shall never forget the appearance presented by the sick of a regiment I inspected in Western Virginia. They were crowded into a small room, from which the light was shut out by blinds and India rubber cloth. Pale and exsanguined, ghost-like looking forms, they scarcely seemed mortal. Convalescence was almost impossible, and doubtless many of them died who, had they been subject to the simplest laws of nature, would have recovered. In convalescence from almost all diseases sunlight acts, unless too intense or too long continued, as a most healthful stimulus both to the nervous and physical systems. The evil effects of keeping such invalids in obscurity are frequently very decidedly shown, and cannot be too carefully guarded against by a physician. The delirium and weakness, which are by no means seldom met with in convalescents kept in darkness, disappear like magic when the rays of the sun are allowed to enter the chamber. I think I have noticed that wounds heal with greater rapidity when light is allowed to reach them than when they are kept continually covered."

Enough instances of the beneficial effects of sunlight have been given, it is hoped, to induce people to open their blinds and let the light into their houses; even if it does fade the carpets, it will brighten the cheeks of the inmates and gladden their hearts.

Cleaning Carpets.

Perhaps the most thorough way to clean a carpet, especially a Brussels carpet, is to lay it on a clean grass plat, face down, and beat it as it lies there. After being beaten thoroughly, it can be dragged by the corners over the grass, which will brush off all adhering dust, and the carpet will be cleaned in the most approved manner. To beat a carpet on a line is but an imperfect way, and the work is not as well done, unless by the most patient beating, besides not being as easy as the first mentioned way. The so called carpet-beating machines in use in this country are barbarous in their treatment of choice floor coverings. With, perhaps, twenty others, our carpets are tumbled about in a great cylinder, until they are folded in a thousand ways, and returned, instead of the stiff, firm carpet sent out, soft, limp articles, that have lost half their wearing qualities.

In England, Ireland and Scotland the prudent housewife compelled the carpet beaters to discard the rotary carpet destroyer, and automatic beating machines are now used, which beat carpets as near like hand work as is possible for machinery to do it. If living in a city, it will pay to employ men to take carpets out into the country and beat them, as above described. After comparing results, carpets will never be beaten by machinery again.

Parlor Furniture.

Never was our stock so complete as the present season. Our Parlor Suites in Silk Brocattelle, upholstered in new and novel effects, are charming, and are sure to please. Our leader is one for $100. It would trouble you to duplicate it anywhere else for $125.

ANOTHER GREAT BARGAIN is our Rug Suite, price $75. Look at those others ask you $90 for, and see if ours is not the same, at $15 less price.

SOLID MAHOGANY Chairs and Rockers. We have a great variety of styles, and one in your parlor is the correct thing. From $9 upwards.

Carpet Department.

We shall continue the sale of our 3 frame Body Brussels, with borders to match, price $1. per yard, until all are sold. Remember, they are perfect goods, the regular price of which is $1.35.

Another great bargain are our Tapestry Brussels Carpets, price 35c. per yard.

They are good quality, good style, and low priced.

Clover Blossom.

For the Children.

Pray who are you? I asked of a child
That I saw in earnest play,
As I trudged along life's dusty road
One morn in the month of May.

She paused, and biting the wide shade hat,
That rested on bright sunny curls,
Said, "I specs I see my papa's Clover Blossom,
And one of de sweetest of girls."

And what are you doing? my sweet litt'le ell,
I asked, and she looked in surprise,
"Why don't you see, making the boys and the girls
Some real nice mud pies."

And where do you live? I asked once more.
She answered in innocent glee,
"Why I live's ter home, in a great big house,
The doggie, and kittie, and me."

And where did you come from? I asked her again,
With a bright pleasant smile and a nod,
She looked in my face and earnestly said,
"Why, I specs 'dat I must come'd f'm God."

Clover Blossom, Clover Blossom, you're a wonderful with 's,

With your curls, and your bright sunny eyes,
And I think that the angels must have brought you down here,
From the gardens of Paradise.

You're a ray of bright sunshine on the river of life,
Shining out like a star, fair and clear,
Sent to lead us poor souls up the pathway of light
And open the gates for us here.

—Fred L. Hildreth.

Military Etiquette.

The Army and Navy Journal, which is considered ultimate authority in military matters disposes of a subject that our soldier boys have discussed no little since the excursion of the Light Infantry to Washington last April. Then there was a good natured difference between the City and Emmet Guards as to the right of the line, each claiming it, one on account of first proffering an escort, the other on account of seniority of the captain. This very clear question and its equally lucid answer will set at rest subsequent issues of similar import.

"Sergeant Worcester, Mass., writes: 'We will suppose there are three military companies, B, C and D. The captain of D is senior captain, B goes away on a pleasure trip, C tenders its services as escort and is accepted. Later, D tenders its services also, and they, too, are accepted. Now we parade, not as a battalion, but as independent companies. Which has the right of line, senior captain D or C, who first tendered their services and were first to be accepted?'

Ans.—Under all rules of Military etiquette, Co. C being the first accepted, should have precedence."

About Folks.

Mr. Elwyn H. Fowler, a graduate of the Perkins Institution for the Blind, who has since his graduation been one of the corps of tuners at the Institution, has taken up his residence in Worcester at No. 16 Oberlin St., and offers his services as a piano forte tuner.

Worcester people are doubtless familiar with the great work done at this school in educating the blind and training them for useful citizens. Among the vocations there taught, music and tuning naturally hold leading places. The tuning business done by the Institution is a large one, the care of the Boston school pianos, mostly Chickering grands, and much of the finest work in the city being intrusted to its tuners. On the Institution tuning circular appear flattering testimonials from such well known musicians as B. J. Lang, Julius Eichberg, Henry C. Carey, James M. McLaughlin, Calixa Lavallee, and others, some of which were elicited by Mr. Fowler's work while he was in the employ of the Institution.

Mr. Fowler comes with the highest recommendations from the Institution, and leading musicians here testify to the excellence of his work.

Prof. W. W. Greene, the well known dancing teacher, will re-open his classes at Grand Army Hall, Monday evening, October 12. Further particulars will be found in his advertisement in this paper.

Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's Winter Trips to California.

It goes without saying that California is the most attractive and popular winter resort in America. Its remarkably salubrious and equable climate gives it an advantage over every other section of the world, in fact. That the coming winter will witness an increased tide of travel to the Pacific Coast, is already strongly indicated. The only remaining question, then, is as to the best way of reaching the land of perpetual Spring and Summer. This query is easily answered. Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's series of eight winter tours provide comforts and luxuries otherwise unattainable. Their parties move across the country in magnificent vestibuled trains, with dining-cars and every other first class appointment. The journey becomes a pleasure even to those who dislike ordinary traveling. Independent tickets are sold, permitting the holder to exercise his own preferences as to the place and time of sojourn and the date of his return. He can travel eastward by any of four different routes, and in any of nine different parties, or independently in any train, the return tickets being good until next July. The first and second parties leave Boston November 12 and December 10. Send to Raymond & Whitcomb, 299 Washington Street (opposite School Street), Boston, for a descriptive circular.

The Rev. W. T. Worth will deliver a lecture in Grace M. E. Church, Thursday evening, Oct. 8 for the benefit of the church.

At the Reform Club, last Sunday night, Major F. G. Stiles put himself on record as being most decidedly in favor of woman's suffrage, a sentiment which seemed to please his auditors also. He believes that such a franchise would aid the Temperance Cause.

Mr. Charles H. Williams, formerly of this city, but lately of Three Oaks, Michigan has removed to Kalamazoo of that state, where he superintended of the Featherbone Company. The business was formerly in Three Oaks.

Leicester.

The annual meeting of the Leicester Magazine Club, was held at the house of Mr. William U. Stone last Monday evening. These officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, H. A. White; secretary and treasurer, J. C. Watson; executive committee, H. A. White, J. C. Watson, W. F. Holman. The following is a list of members. The periodicals are forwarded in the order indicated. A. H. Coolidge, H. A. White, Miss Ida F. Warren, Geo. E. Marsh, Mrs. C. A. Denny, Mrs. Wm. U. Stone, Mrs. L. D. Thurston, Mrs. Alonzo White, Miss Eldora E. Loring, Wm. F. Holman, J. C. Watson, Mrs. F. H. Gifford, C. A. Page. The Club voted to take The Century Magazine, Scribner's Magazine, Popular Science Monthly, Good Housekeeping, Forum, North American Review, Harper's Young People, Harper's Bazar, Cosmopolitan, Scientific American and The Magazine of Art. The regulations are given below: Periodicals shall be forwarded on Wednesdays and Saturdays, and only in the order indicated by the list. On second reading send only to those whose names are checked. Each member shall note the exact date of receiving and forwarding in ink. Members wishing a second reading will check their names. Fine for detention, five cents a day. Any member receiving a publication which is overdue, shall at once report the delinquency to the treasurer. The member who has the last reading of a periodical shall forward it to the secretary. Any person injuring publications will be held responsible. Fine for non-attendance at the annual meeting in September, one dollar. First reading, three days; second reading, one week.

The members of the club regret that Mrs. Harrington withdrew her membership. Mr. Page was the fortunate one to fill the vacancy and he was made welcome by all. The club enters upon the 12th year of its reign.

"Nothing lives in literature but that which has in it the vitality of creative art; and it would be safe advice to the young to read nothing but what is old."

Monday evening was one of pleasure as well as profit. Miss Stone dispensed lemonade, and the eleventh anniversary passed off with pleasant anticipations for long life to all the members of the Leicester Magazine Club.

Amateur Sports.

The members' handicap games on the Worcester Oval last Saturday were very successful, though fault might be found with the slowness with which the events were run off. The results were as follows:—

100 yard dash, first heat—W. H. Allison, 7 yards, first; J. H. Adams, 4 yards, second. Second heat—W. H. Fuller, 5 yards, first; H. H. Sibley, 6 yards, second. Final heat—Allison, first; Adams, second. Time, 10.45 seconds.

Putting 16 pound shot—F. J. Zaeder, 2 feet, 31 feet 9 inches; R. J. Clapp, 3 feet, second, 31 feet 7 inches.

One-half mile run—Fuller, 45 yards, first, 2 minutes 11.5 seconds, W. A. Beaudette, 75 yards and Allison, 10 yards, tied for second. Beaudette won the toss.

One-mile bicycle—F. J. Johnson, 60 yards, first, 3 minutes 5.45 seconds; Miller, scratch, second.

220 yards hurdle—Adams, 8 yards, first, 30 seconds; Allison, 10 yards, second.

Pole vault—Kinsley, 6 inches, first, 9 feet, 5 inches; Brennan, scratch, second, 9 feet 1 inch.

220 yards dash—Adams, 9 yards, first, 24.15 seconds; Allison, 15 yards, second.

One mile run—J. M. Gallagher, 30 yards, first, 4 minutes 49.45 seconds; Beaudette, 120 yards, second.

The second and last of the members' games takes place this afternoon, when a large number of athletes will compete in the following events:—

Quarter-mile run, one-mile walk, 120 yard hurdle, running broad jump, throwing 16 pound hammer and two mile bicycle. Admission will be free to members upon presentation of membership tickets. Also ladies will be admitted free.

Badly Fooled.

Last night a body of men stood in a drug store in Athens, talking over the exceedingly dry state of affairs in Clark county, at present.

A gentleman walked in and, accosting the druggist, asked for some turpentine. He pulled a bottle from his pocket and handed it over to the druggist.

"It's had beer in it," remarked the gentleman, "but it's all right."

The druggist filled it with a white-looking liquid and the gentleman as he passed out gave the crowd the wink, as much as to tell them that they could get all they wanted back in the drug store.

They smacked their lips in delight. Finally one of them walked back and said: "My wife is sick, and the doctor says for me to get some turpentine, and you can just put in this little flask. It's had whisky in it, but it is all right."

The flask was filled at once. And then another put up the plea that he was all broken up, and that the doctor had advised him to rub himself all over with turpentine, and he wanted a quart.

His whisky bottle was filled also. And so on for some time, until the whole crowd had laid in a bottle of turpentine apiece.

The last one, just as he rounded a neighboring corner, was suddenly taken with a pain, and concluded to try the virtue of a drink of —. Well, he took it, and then swore. He raved and tore his hair, and frantically pawed up the earth. A few blocks from where he stood, another turpentine buyer was calling for water and swearing he was a conflagration. And so it went.

The druggist sold out his stock of turpentine at a good profit, and Clarke county still remained dry.—Demorest (Ga.) Times.

Grace.

She couldn't eat.

Then, for excuse, remarked:

"Grace before meat!"

—Judge.

Then life is—to wake not sleep.

Rise and rest, but press

From earth's level where blindly creep

Things perfect'd, more or less,

To the heaven's height, far and steep.

When see? When there dawns a day,

If not o' the homely earth,

Then yonder, world's away.

Where the strange and new have birth,

And power comes full in plav.

—Browning.

General Sherman, one of our exchanges says, was fond of telling this bit of negro philosophy: "When I was in the army in Georgia, a slave-owner one Christmas missed a fat turkey. He suspected a fine looking colored man, and had him brought before him. 'You have stolen my turkey and eaten it,' said the irate master. 'I see not gwine to say I didn't when you says I did, massa.' 'I ought to do something to you. What have you got to say why I should not punish you?' 'Well, massa, you hain't los' anything particular. You see, you has a little less turkey, and a good deal more nigger.'"

The Evening Sun tells of a parson who had call from a little country parish to a large and wealthy one in a big city. He asked time for prayer and consideration. He did not feel sure of his light. A month passed. Finally some one met his youngest son on the street. "How is it, Josiah," said the neighbor, "is your father going to B—?" "Well," answered the youngster judiciously, "Paw is still praying for light, but most of the things is packed."

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a housekeeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility. One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

"What is my faith," you ask of me?

My faith is not of words and creeds,
My faith is in all faithful acts,
And in all noble deeds.

My faith is that all should try
To make this world so glad and bright,
That hearts should fill with gladness all,
And every soul with light.

—O. F.—

There is no lack of diversion in Worcester.

The Festival left the steady goers so tired that some said they could sleep a week.

But hard after that came the Republican mass meeting and the gathering of the clans for the Democratic convention.

Every body who was present must concede that City Committee Chairman Winslow bore his honors excellently and that he had reason to congratulate himself over the success of the meeting.

Then if a man of either party entered Mechanics Hall at about 1 p.m., Tuesday, and beheld the furor of applause that greeted Governor Russell he must have concluded that this is thoroughly a young man's day in politics.

From the West gallery there was a great array of bald heads visible but every one was bobbing in behalf of the boy like figure on the platform, the young governor about whom the Republicans and Democrats differ so much in sentiment.

Then, too, on the same day, the City Guards celebrated their 51st anniversary, ending the same with a dinner at the hall of the Continentals, having present at least one man who was a Guard fifty-one years ago.

In all these festivities, there are found people who talk about a new City Hall. Wouldn't it be a good idea for them to wait till the new Post Office is built? One thing at a time. Then, when that is completed, perhaps we shall know better where we want the City Hall. Possibly, too, there may be, then, less than now who would consent to yield one foot of the Common for any such purpose.

Build monuments there; but when the time comes to tear down the present edifice, by the way, paid for, let no structure of any kind be erected there. Generations hence, blessings will be ours if we hold this space for just what it was at first devoted to, a Common. There are places enough for the City Hall, better in every way than that, which may be given, too, if we will but bide our time.

Have a care for the little ones. A lady has been heard to say, "I was married when very young and how I lacked in judgement! I have locked my little boy up in a dark closet and have gone out calling, leaving him to cry himself to sleep. I condemn myself every time I think of it. I can't punish myself now save as the memory afflicts me; but I can lift a warning voice to other mothers, young as I was, and who wonder why they must be tied down to a child's cradle." If by any chance that cradle becomes empty, then fancy the sorrow that follows. Better the same with its bud of promise there, though it takes all your time, than the cradle forsaken and you desolate. Don't leave your children to shift for themselves in their early childhood. Flames may burn or the darkness may terrify! Care for them constantly and, by and by, you will be repaid a thousand fold.

ABOUT FOLKS.

Comrade Alfred S. Smedley, who has been away from the city four months in Halifax, Vt., has reached home again, having taken an eighty miles drive down from his Vermont headquarters. He arrived in Worcester, Sunday last. He has all the appearance of perfect agreement with Vermont atmosphere and fare.

The Lakeside Boat Club observed the closing of its lake club house, last evening, by giving a reception to its gentlemen and lady friends. As LIGHT was already printed when the affair took place it is unable to give a detailed account this week. It is safe to say, though, that it was very successful and very enjoyable, for this is always true of the Lakesides' receptions. A fuller account will be given in the next paper.

Mr. Wm. E. Starr, of the State Mutual Life Assurance Company, has been attending the meeting of the Actuarial Society in Toronto, Sept. 30 and Oct. 1st, his first visit to that Canadian city since 1836, and then it was called York.

Mr. Orman L. Taft, superintendent of the T. K. Earle Man'g'g Company, returned Monday from Nantucket, where he has been taking a well deserved rest. Mr. Edward P. Taft returned with him.

Two blossoms of the night blooming cereus opened last Saturday evening at the home of Mrs. Warren J. Cutting, 123 West Street. Many friends and neighbors were present to watch their gradual unfolding. Miss Clara Burnham, pianist, and Miss Knight, vocalist, entertained the company most acceptably. War songs were sung, in which all joined. Ice cream and cake were served, and all spent a most agreeable evening.

Miss Helen De Forest Marshall, who has had excellent success in her art studies, will instruct pupils at No. 1 Congress Street. Thursday, from three till ten o'clock, friends were received at her home to inspect her work.

Monday, Alfred C. N. Petersen, W. H. S. class of '86, took the entrance examinations for the school of architecture, Boston Institute of Technology, and passed them successfully.

The Rev. Anson Titus, formerly settled over the Universalist Church in Charlton, but later in Towanda, Penn., has been visiting in Worcester this week. He is an accomplished antiquarian and genealogist.

Mr. Chas. A. Gray, W. H. S. class of '91, has entered Harvard for a special course in English literature.

O. B. Hadwen is one of the expert judges called at the Brockton Agricultural Fair.

Mr. Samuel Hathaway of Thompsonville, Conn., an old Worcester resident and a valued contributor to LIGHT has been in the city during the week, drawn hither in part by the anniversary of the City Guards.

Twenty-Fifth.

The annual reunion of this Regiment will be held on the 15th, inst., in G. A. R. Hall. Dinner in Continental Hall as usual.

For Hope Church.

The lecture by Mr. Joseph Cook, Oct. 26, at Association Hall, on "Seven Modern Wonders" is considered one of the very best of his subjects. It is an epitome of an around the world trip taken by him. In his incisive way he tells us of the wonders of today, far eclipsing those of the early world.

Marriages.

At the Church of the Sacred Heart, Wednesday, by the Rev. Dr. Thomas J. Conaty, Patrick F. Clark and Miss Hannah E. Shea. At St. John's Church, by the Rev. M. S. G. Thomas Griffin, Wednesday, Daniel E. Conlin to Miss Mary E. Keegan.

At St. John's Church, Wednesday afternoon, by the Rev. C. M. Foley, James McGinn to Miss Bridget McDonald.

A Sutton Record.

There are several burial grounds in Sutton. Some are private, more are public. Of some, the deeds of holding are recorded, but one has the record in a queer place. The man gave the plot, but no County office has any record of the gift and the only one extant is that chiseled upon the stone commemorative of the giver. But this is considered sufficient, for here one may read that the stone is sacred to the memory of him who gave the land for the cemetery. No one presumes to dispute the validity of the title.

Nearing Heaven.

Recently during the Junior singing hour at the High School, a pupil to play accompaniments did not appear, so one of the teachers volunteered. The exercise was the chanting of the Lord's Prayer. It was very slow and the conductor repeatedly stopped the class before reaching the word Heaven in the first clause, till finally, the pianist in despair left her seat exclaiming, "Mr. R. I think these Juniors are entirely too long getting to Heaven."

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, OCT. 3, 1891.

The excellent photograph for the cut of the Conant Mansion, LIGHT owes to Mr. Eben Harrington of Harvard Street.

Rev. Father Thomas J. Conaty of the Church of the Sacred Heart sends out the October Monthly Calendar, as ever filled with material useful to the members of his parish. He makes it an epitome of facts pertinent to his church and people. Golden Rod is very fitly the refrain in this month.

LIGHT hereby acknowledges the courtesy of a season ticket to the Sioux City, Iowa, Corn Fair, and regrets exceedingly that distance will not permit the pleasure of taking a part in this wonderful feast of Mondamin. Should any LIGHT readers be going that way, this ticket is at their disposal with the expectation of a right good, well corned letter in return.

Worcester's whilom schoolboy and teacher, Charles S. Chapin, appears to be on the top-most wave of success in Fitchburg. The High School is much larger than ever before, in fact the numbers are away beyond the usual percentage of attendance. All this is gratifying to his Worcester friends.

Town Talk of Fitchburg comes out with a new front; a great improvement. The form is just a little suggestive of the well known title page of LIGHT; all the better for that of course. It looks as though Fitchburg people enjoyed "Town Talk."

The Amherst Student, under the business management of Charles E. Hildreth of this city, appears in a new form. A very handsome cover has a new title head, with a picture of the beautiful college church included, and below is a picture of President Gates. A picture in this place, is to be a feature hereafter. "The Student" has an excellent look, and if there be an Amherst graduate in these parts who does not take the paper, let him be held for disloyalty. It is one of the very best college papers.

About Folks.

Corrections.

In LIGHT's account of the Guards, two weeks since, some blunders appeared. For Major Francis A. Blake, read Mayor James B. Blake. The Guards in the Rebellion should have been signed Ex-Captain, but the words were dropped down into the next line. Major Shumway belonged to the 4th not 7th Vermont.

"FRIDAY POPULARS."

Among the many young pianists of this city who are winning success in their chosen profession, Harry C. Mullett appears to be one of the leading. One year ago he opened a studio in the Knowles Building, and last season, his first in this city, was very successful. The one just commencing is even more promising than the last. Mr. Mullett received his instruction from Arthur Adams, the composer of the mass given at the recent Festival and from B. J. Lang of Boston.

October 1st Mr. John Marble celebrated his eighty-ninth birthday at No. 33 Harvard Street. Twelve of his near friends and relatives gathered to take tea with him and congratulate him on the return of the day which finds him so well and hale as he is. Flowers were sent and the day made pleasant in every way by the thoughtfulness of his many friends.

Mr. Ben T. Hammond recently received a letter from William Shakespeare, the famous London teacher and composer, whom he met in his recent trip abroad, in which occur the following lines: "I must express my gratification at the strides I find you have made in the art since we met two years since. Our last lessons and conversations I am sure will give you courage to resume lessons with increased ardor and high standard." Commendation from so high an authority must be very agreeable to Mr. Hammond. It certainly delights his friends.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Lothrop's Opera House.

It was a border drama which held the interest of the crowds at this resort this week. "49" is full of stirring events. A fortune, a missing heiress, a pretended heiress, good men and villains all get mixed in many complications until the last act when all trouble clears away and justice and virtue prevail. "Old 49," Mr. J. Francis Kirke was a striking figure. Miss Ethel Tucker, as "Carrots" the missing heiress, was a decided success. They received excellent support from the remainder of the company. "The Artful Dodger" was the title of the farce which preceded the drama. There will be two more performances of these, one this afternoon and one this evening.

The New England comedy drama "Dad's Girl" will be given next week by the stock company of which Miss Katherine Rober and Mr. Max Freeman are the leaders. The farce which will precede each performance is entitled "Baker's Daughter."

WORCESTER Saturday, Oct. 3 1891.

Bengaline is the new wave in black silks. It is being everywhere mentioned and advertised. Fashion journals commend its use for many styles of gowns.

The fabric is of silk and wool; warp of silk, filling of wool. The wool is invisible and very fine. The virtue of the combination lies in the strength of the fabric and its lightness and softness. It drapes nearly as gracefully as a silk-warp henrietta, and lacks none of the raven-black brilliancy of the Faille Francaise.

Bengaline is superior for wear, softness, and in mellow touch to any black or colored silk at its price. It will never crack or slip. Its wrinkles shake out like brilliantine, and it does not tumble or muss, as a pure silk.

In black, the weaves are of a fine faille pattern, and of the now fashionable cord surface. $1.25; 20 inches. We have never thought of marking the price over $1.25, so were a little surprised upon being shown Saturday a piece of the very same Bengaline as this $1.25 number, bought by the lady who exhibited it in Boston for $1.50. Suffice it to say that this lady was more than surprised; she was indignant.

Bengaline is also here in colors; the cord effect being heavier than in black. The shades are rich, deep, and warm; $1.50 a yard. The faille-like weave is $1.25, in the new Fall shades.

Small, cute figures in dainty colors, scattered quite wide apart over solid black grounds have the lead for combination dresses of black or autumn colors in either silk or wool; $1.00.

For evening gowns:—

Jacquard Indias, with self-color figures. White, cream, pink, lavender and blue, $1.25. The same Indias as above with colored French flower figures, $1.37.
Plain white China silk, 75¢; 28 inch.
Crepe de chine, $1.25.
Highest class two-toned novelties, elaborate brocades, etc., $2.50.
Bengaline Jacquard, $1.25.
Green satin, with open-work lace stripes, $1.25.

The City Guards,

The Field Day of the Guards was not smiled upon by the skies though every item on the program was carried out. The shooting may not have been quite up to the record of former years, but there were reasons for that. The dress parade was among the best ever witnessed in Worcester. The evening in Continental Hall was enjoyable, quite devoid of formality, every one enjoying himself in his own way. Rebball set out the tables and they were lavishly covered and liberally patronized, while the band of Battery B, furnished delicious music. Among the past members and guests present were Mayor F. A. Harrington, Alderman Francis Plunkett, Gen. Robert H. Chamberlain, Gen. Josiah Pickett, Col. E. J. Russell, Maj. E. R. Shumway, Capt. E. A. Wood, Capt. L. G. Bigelow, Capt. Harry B. Fairbanks, Vice Depart. Com. G. A. R., James K. Churchill, Sen. Vice Com., J. B. Leprie, G. A. R., Capt. E. H. Leavitt, Orange, Lieut. George H. Harlow, Armorer George E. Hubbard, Lieut. P. L. Ryder, Lieut. Waldo Simpson, Lieut. H. W. Haynes, Lieut. W. F. Gilman, Lieut. George M. Rice, 2d, Lieut. James Early, Lieut. John E. Lancaster, Lieut. S. A. Willis, Lieut. Hathaway, George S. Bliss, W. F. Pond, A. S. Roe, A. J. Marble, F. H. Rice, John J. Quinn, Charles Thwing, E. L. Hayden, Alonzo Hoyle, Adin E. Brown, Thomas Kenney, James McDonough, William Wilkins and Herman Lucke.

At 9 o'clock, Captain Condy called the company to order and introduced Alfred S. Roe, who announced the prize winners. First prize, company gold medal, to be held for the year, and a gold watch, Lieut. M. H. Tisdell, his third time; second prize, sharpshooter's badge and a shaving mug, Corporal Geo. E. Warren; third prize, a revolver, Private E. A. Price; fourth prize, a gold ring, Private Charles Dwinnett; fifth prize a silver-headed cane, Musician H. R. Behrens; sixth prize, gold stud, Private E. H. Willard; seventh prize, order for cuff buttons, Lieut. E. G. Barrett. The "leather medal," a toy gun, went to Private Walter Allison, who brought the diminutive piece to a carry and saluted on receiving it.

The first prize for honoraries, a gold headed umbrella, went to Lieut. J. B. Willard, and the second, an order for a hat, to John J. Quinn.

At 10.15 "Auld Lang Syne" brought the gathering to an end.

There is a flourishing veterans' organization of the Guards and at the afternoon meeting in G. A. R. Hall, Gen. Josiah Pickett was elected as president. Other officers elected were: Gen Robert H. Chamberlain, ex-Sheriff A. B. R. Sprague and Maj. E. R. Shumway, vice-presidents; Capt. E. A. Wood, secretary and treasurer.

DEVENS AND METCALF.

Dedicated to the Worcester City Guards by A Charter Member.

The charter members are few and growing less, year by year. Soon the last will strike his flag; the touch of the elbow in line will be broken and the story of the beginning will be told only in written history.

But it matters not who falls out. The march still goes on, and the heavy foot-fall of years, the cadence step of the march of centuries

Halts not for high nor low,
But in your drum beat, to-day
Sound the ruffles of woe,
As you pay affection's tribute of marching salute,
O'er the new made grave
Where our beloved Devens sleeps!
But a twelve month ago and
His ringing voice stirred our souls
With words of eloquence, of cheer and love.
And now he lies there beneath
The silent shelter tent of death.
A relieved soldier taking his rest,
With his stary shroud around him,
Beneathing us the rich legacy
Of the sweet memory of the noble life,
And many virtues of the Soldier,
The Statesman, the Orator, the Lawyer the Judge and the Friend.
Peace to thine ashes, comrade, Peace!
But thee immortal Chieftain's spirit
Will still lead us on.

At our fiftieth anniversary, too,
An honored Honorary was there,
Who now with thine arms sleeps
The sweet sleep that knows no waking.

And over all the land beneath
Many a costly grave 'neath
Are sorrowing hearts that tremble with
A faithful guide and teacher gone,
And who will ever lose his memory green,
And enshrine the name of Metcalf
Among their best beloved friends.
And so they go, through
The dark valley of the shadowy wilderness
To the immortal campfires glow
A low bugle notes of minor strain,
The triple shout, death's last refrain,
And the order comes, "Forward, March!"
And with quick-step feet
To the drum's muffled beat,
We who remain, take up thine' march again.
Lead on Young Guard! Oh lead on!
With sweet hosannas of song,
Eighteen thro's toast to Ninety-one "Hail Young Guard, and march on!"

CHURCH NOTES.

CONGREGATIONAL.

The program for the installation, next Tuesday evening, of Rev. Inman L. Wilcox as pastor of Park Church is as follows: Voluntary and anthems; statement of council, scribe; invocation, Rev. R. M. Taft; anthem; scripture reading, Rev. Lawrence Perry; hymn; sermon, Rev. Archibald McCullagh, D. D.; installing prayer, Rev. Dr. A. E. P. Perkins; response by choir; right hand of fellowship, Rev. C. M. Southgate; charge to pastor, Rev. A. H. Coolidge of Leicester; address to people, Rev. George H. Gould, D. D.; hymn; benediction.

The Ladies' Aid Society connected with Pilgrim Church announced a most interesting musical and literary entertainment to be given in the vestry, Thursday evening, Oct. 8th. The program has been most carefully arranged and comprises the choicest selections from the extensive repertoire of the several artists whose names alone are a sufficient guarantee as to its merits. Miss Susie D. Drew, the elocutionist, has already appeared before Worcester audiences at three different times under the auspices of this same society and upon each occasion has been accorded a most hearty welcome and received the most enthusiastic commendations of all who have listened to her. The fact that she brings with her on the present occasion Miss Carrie Louise St. John, vocalist; Miss Vida Ayer, violinist; Miss L. Myrcie Ludlow, pianist lends added interest to an entertainment that will undoubtedly receive a most liberal patronage.

UNIVERSALITY.

The Ladies Social Circle of the First Universalist Church will hold its first meeting this season on Tuesday, next.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

The funeral of Walter Hoyce took place from St. John's Church last week Tuesday morning. He was a charter member of the Father Matthew Society, having received the pledge from the noble hands of Father Matthew, him self, forty-two years ago.

The Forty Hour's Devotion commenced at Sacred Heart Church last week Sunday morning at half past ten mass. The Rev. M. W. Mulhane was celebrant, the Rev. J. J. Tyrrell, deacon, the Rev. J. J. Donnelly sub-deacon. The ceremonies closed Tuesday morning with a high mass at eight o'clock.

The Rev. Robert Walsh is to hold a bazaar next month to aid in the building of his new house.

The Worcester Natural History Society.

As a rule a city or town may be known by the number and quality of her public institutions. In this direction, Worcester has long enjoyed an enviable reputation. Among the societies and agencies working for the public good, that one to which this article is devoted is worthy of conspicuous mention. At this moment, when its removal from the old quarters, in the Worcester Bank Block, to its new abode on Harvard street is just effected, it is eminently fitting that the new home should be pictured and the Society described. The projectors of this organization are yet living and its parentage is certainly honorable, for it was in August, 1852, agreeably to a call printed in the Spy, that the Rev. E. E. Hale, then the pastor of the Church of the Unity, called to order a meeting of representative young men in Waldo Hall. Our present Senator, George F. Hoar was chairman and Wm. Mecorney, Secretary. From this time, place and beginning grew this flourishing body. Of course, there were mutations and tribulations, not a few, but the growth is what we know as the Natural History Society. A permanent organization was effected in December, 1852, with the late Francis H. Dewey, President; George W. Bently Vice-president; George F. Hoar, Corresponding Secretary; Nathaniel Paine, Recording Secretary; and Henry Woodward, Treasurer. This was a good foundation. April 16, 1853, the Society was incorporated and subscriptions were solicited for the formation of a library. About $1,300 were raised for this purpose and 867 volumes were given out-right by citizens. This library was opened June 18, 1853. A reading room was also established.

It was not till 1854 that the natural history department of the society, now so prominent, was begun. In fact, up to that time, it was a Lyceum and Literary body. The great Scientist, Prof. Louis Agassiz, was invited to visit Worcester and to give the benefit of his experience and knowledge. He came the 28th of April, 1854 and inspected the collection of specimens that had been held by the Antiquarian Society for the old Lyceum. This lot was passed over to the new body and the department was under the care of the Rev. E. E. Hale as chairman, Mr. Wm. E. Starr, Secretary; and James B. Blake, whom Henry A. Marsh soon succeeded, as Treasurer. Eight curators of as many divisions were also appointed. In 1856 Dr. John Green placed his valuable library in the care of the Society. These books, with others belonging to the Society or in its care passed in 1859 to the care of the city, forming the foundation of the Public Library. The report recommending this disposition was signed by Dr. George Chandler, Albert Tolman and the Rev. T. W. Higginson.

During the winter months of many years, the Society maintained very flourishing lecture courses, but these were finally given up, leaving only the work in natural history for which it was specially organized. In 1866, the name became The Worcester Lyceum and Natural History Society and every effort was directed toward natural history attainments.

The Society as we know it today, with its many divisions and workings may be said to date from the Presidency of Dr. W. H. Raymenton. This was in 1880. He at once set about classes of instruction in various departments and for many years gave nearly all his time to its furthering. It would be unfair, however, not to mention in this connection the long services of Mr. Thomas A. Dickinson, who invited hither that eminent Scientist, Francis G. Sanborn who long cared for the cabinet. Mr. Dickinson succeeded Mr. James G. Arnold in his custodianship. Dr. Raymenton drew into the free class work a large number of the very best teachers in the city, such as Messrs. Jackson and Lyford in Botany; Thompson, Fuller and Perry in Geology; Forbush in Taxidermy; Dr. Francis in Photography; Mr. Bemis and Dr. Woodward an edifice large and commodious. The effects of the society have been carried thither and as rapidly as possible are being placed. It is hard to transform a fine dwelling house into the ideal museum, but just as far as possible this is being done under the capable direction of President Bemis and his assistants, Mrs. O. H. Morrow and Mr. E. L. Morris. As we enter the State Street door we have at our left the old reception room of the homestead, with the very carpet and center table, still in place, with the face of the daughter, whose early death inflicted such a wound upon Mr. Conant, looking down upon what will be the office of the society. Across the hall is a suite of rooms where will be displayed cases and where public meetings will be held. In the halls, also, are cases of specimens. On the second floor will be more cases along with the and Workman in Anatomy and Microscopy and many more who were willing to give time and talent for the bettering of the public. Large sums of money were requisite to carry on this work; Dr. Raymenton seemed to have the "open sesame" to the pockets of Worcester's wealthy citizens so that in his nine years of office about $5,000 were paid into the treasury for the expenses of the Society.

March 6, 1884, the name was changed again to that which it holds now, the one to obtain, probably, for many a day. The quarters, ample as they at first appeared on Foster Street, gradually grew too narrow and the bequest of the late Mr. Conant came none too soon to meet a pressing want. Mr. Conant, in willing his fine residence, corner of Harvard and State Streets, placed at the disposal of the society working laboratories. The third floor is devoted to storage purposes as is also the barn.

Following the very successful presidency of Dr. Raymenton, Mr. E. H. Forbush was placed at the head, holding the place till his appointment upon a state commission, when he resigned and Dr. Merrick Bemis was elected his successor. The superintendent of the museum is Henry Billings. In conclusion, it may be said that the society is doing a great deal to popularize the study and pursuit of Natural History in its many phases. There are few young people who are not delighted with the cases of specimens and a leaning towards nature is very easily effected. Dr. Alexander Agassiz has visited our society as did his father before him and has spoken in terms of praise of the work it is doing here.

Some day, the proceedings and discoveries of our society must be published, ranking, it is hoped, with those of the famous Institute of Salem. It is growing in form and favor. Earnest and faithful people are sustaining it and, in the future, more than in the past it must be an institution of our city. It is a place for boys and girls to visit and in it be taught to love nature in all her guises.

The former has repeatedly paid off deficiencies and purchased land, while the latter has liberally met the wants of the society. To them, along with H. H. Bigelow, is owed the building up and the maintenance of the Camp at the Lake. Many thousands of dollars have been expended in making this a pleasant and profitable place for boys during the vacation season. Located north of the causeway it is these Summer Schools, drawn from such diverse localities indicate most decidedly their popularity and success.

EDWIN CONANT, ESQ.

The generous benefactor of the town of Sterling and of the Natural History Society was once a well known figure in Worcester, but this was long ago. Latterly he went but little from his home. At the time of his death, he was the oldest member of the Worcester County Bar.

A native of the town of Sterling, he ever retained an exceeding fondness of her and her interest. He was born Oct. 20th, 1810, and was graduated at Harvard in the famous class of 1829. He studied law with Rejoice Newton and William Lincoln in Worcester. Beginning practice in Sterling in 1832, he remained there four years and then came to Worcester, where his home continued, though he was a practitioner for only about ten years. Inheriting great wealth from his father, Jacob Conant, he had had enough to do in looking after its investment and progress.

His first home in Worcester was on the site of the present St. Johns Episcopal Church and a memorial window from him is in the edifice for his daughter.

While yet a law student, he gave a Fourth of July Oration in Worcester in 1831, and in 1836, he was elected President of the Worcester Agricultural Society, thus indicating his love for Natural History, still further indication of which is seen in his bequest to Worcester's Natural History Society. With an abundance of leisure, plenty of means and refined tastes it is not strange that his private library was one of the finest in the city.

Mr. Conant's first wife, whom he married in 1832, was the daughter of Hon. Joseph Estabrook of Royalston and sister of the late Mrs. Isaac Davis. Both his children, now dead, Elizabeth Anne and Helen Maria, were by his first wife. His last wife was Elizabeth S., daughter of Joseph Wheeler, Jr., who was son of Rev. Joseph Wheeler, formerly Unitarian clergyman in Harvard, and afterwards register of probate in Worcester from 1776 till his death in 1793.

For many years his home was, at the corner of Harvard and State Street, at his death given to the Natural History Society.

Very rarely were people seen about the house and citizens who had passed it daily, for years knew nothing of the kind gentleman who resided there. His deeds of kindness were not ostentatiously done, but his gifts to the town of Sterling could not well be hidden. There, a substantial building and a well equipped library will long bear tribute to his love and generosity.

He died at 11 a.m., March 2d and his funeral was observed the Thursday following. A former pastor, the Rev. E. H. Hall from Cambridge conducted the services, which were attended by many of our most respected citizens. His will disclosed many public benefactions, his Alma Mater receiving the final and largest share, though the gift to our Society is a large and worthy one. He is buried with his kindred in Rural Cemetery.

Schray THE NEW HOTEL, STERLING.

Hotel PUBLIC LIBRARY, STERLING.

In addition to the home work of the society it is also responsible for the Summer School at Natural History Park. Several gentlemen aside from Mr. Conant have been prominent in their benefactions. Mr. Salisbury, the elder, as well as his son have done much for it and with them must be included the Hon. Joseph H. Walker and Mr. Thomas H. Dodge.

annually growing in favor. The last two seasons, under the care of Mr. Charles E. Burbank of Amherst College have done much to popularize this place of Natural History work. The methods and prospects of the camp were set forth by Principal Russell of the State Normal School in a report to the State Board of Education, 1887-'88. The patronage of Mr. Conant in 1836, in memory of his deceased daughter, Miss Elizabeth Anne, cost $600, and followed a former gift of $500, for the purchase of books. Standing near the public common, in the center of the village, the edifice is an ornament to the village. LITTON is indebted to Librarian C. B. Tillinghast, of the State Library for the use of the accompanying cut. There are in the building above 4000 volumes in the care of Mrs. Bonney, librarian. It was formally dedicated, October 13, 1836, with an address by the Rev. Edward H. Hall of Cambridge, but previously of Worcester. There is much in Sterling to remind the people of Mr. Conant. This building, the new hotel and the old Conant mansion is yet standing, the abode of Mr. Nourse. The villages beautiful in itself, becomes through Mr. Conant's munificence one of the most attractive places in the state.

Another illustration of Mr. Conant's continued interest in his native town, is seen in his connection with the new hotel project. After the burning of the old hotel last year, efforts were made to rebuild, but it was only when Mr. Conant lent his help that it was possible to secure the requisite means. The Conant Hotel Company was organized and incorporated and immediate steps taken towards building. It was late in the fall when the work was actually begun and about July 1st, when the new Sterling Inn was ready for occupancy. Its site is that of the old hotel, though set back much further from the street, leaving a beautiful lawn in front to the east, while directly at the north is the village common. The building is from plans by Architect Stephen C. Earle of this city and presents an exterior of quiet, simple dignity and a convenient, pleasant and homelike interior. It comprises a main building 40x55 feet with a wing 38x40 feet. It has the lower story of cobblestone masonry, with shingled wood construction above,—two stories to the main part and one in the wing and a quaint, rather flat gambrel roof with widely projecting eaves. The view here shown is from the south-east, as seen when approaching the road from Worcester. A broad balcony extends the entire length of the east front of the main building and over the carriage porch at the north, and gives shelter to the entrance on the north end and to the front entrance. The latter with its wide single door and sidelights, faces the street which leads up from the railway station and opens into a hall which connects directly with the office at the right. This occupies the north-east corner of the lower story and connects directly with another hall and the north entrance. From this hall the main stairs lead to the principal story, and a parallel flight on the outside leads to an entrance on the main story. The kitchen occupies the south-east corner of the lower story of the main building and the rear of this story is devoted to store-rooms, heating apparatus, etc. A billiard room occupies the entire ground floor of the wing. This has its own separate entrance at the front, and an inviting fireplace. The principal story of the main building has the parlor at the north-east and the dining room at the south-east, each with a fireplace and a corner bay. The remainder of this story, and the stories above are devoted to single rooms and rooms in suites, together with the requisite halls, stairways, bath rooms and abundant closets. Its steam heating ensures comfort in winter, and an abundant supply of fine running water satisfies the first requisite of a healthy human habitation.

Mrs. Mattoon's afternoon dancing class will meet for the first time next Wednesday afternoon at two o'clock. The evening class will not commence until October 28.

Mr. and Mrs. Mander A. Maynard have been taking a ten days drive through the country, visiting Greenville, Turners Falls, Northfield, the Deerfield Valley and other places of interest. They proclaim the excursion a most enjoyable one.

Mrs. Jennie Rice Ware, late a teacher in the High School, will be in the city Thursday. She begins her Boston School duties next week. There was an interesting article from her pen in the N. E. Journal of Education Sept. 10. Therein are set forth the disadvantages of mingling so much church work with school life. It should be read by all parents.

Major Wm. T. Harlow returns from a trip to Savannah, Ill.

Dr. George H. Kelley second son of the late Dr. Frank H. Kelley has opened an office on Elm Street.

General Robert H. Chamblin deputy grand commander visited Lowell Thursday in his official capacity.

Joseph E. Davis and family will spend the winter at the Tudor in Boston.

Mr. W. L. Noble, for some time past connected with the dry goods house of Edward L. Smith & Co., as a salesman, leaves this week for Pittsfield, where he has accepted a position as window trimmer in a prominent local house.

An ex-governor of Wisconsin, famous as a story-teller, is reported by the Chicago Tribune as having related an anecdote of his own experience with a man of the latter class. The governor was at a clam-bake in New Jersey, and, after dinner, was called upon for a speech: I started off by saying that I had eaten so many of their low-necked clams that I wasn't in the least sort of condition for speech-making. At that moment a long-faced old man, directly across the table scowled at me and said, in a stage-whisper: 'Little-neck clams, little-necks—not low-necks.' I paid no attention to him and went on with my remarks. After dinner he followed me out of the hall. 'You are from Wisconsin, ain't you?' he asked. 'Yes,' I answered. 'You don't have many clams out there, I reckon?' 'Well,' said I, 'we have some but it's a good way to water, and in driving them across the country their feet get sore and they don't thrive very well.' He gave me a look that was worth a dollar and a half. 'Why man alive!' said he, 'clams ain't got no feet.' He turned away, and shortly afterward approached one of my friends: 'Is that fellow governor of Wisconsin?' he inquired. 'Yes,' 'W-a-a!,' said he, 'he may be a smart man in Wisconsin, but he's a good deal of a fool at the sea-shore.'

FOR M.

There in the silent room where we walked, in the great dark house, he lies:
In the chamber of Death there is only peace, though the rooms of Life are sad:
To the whispered queries of those who come there are mournfully hushed replies.
As though in glad he could find no joy, when his life was always glad.

The life that can be lived out but once he turned to the use of men,
And when he was crushed by sorrow, in meekness he kissed the rod;
His joy we may weep for only since his hand lays down the pen;
His songs are the people's, ever, while his soul communes with God.

It is not so much the part he bore in the daily work of the world,
But the grand, sweet influence coming from all that he thought and said,
The voice for the Right, and the search for Truth, under Liberty's banner unfurled,
The fragrance of good deeds bravely done that lasts though the man be dead.

Born out of the true nobility, and suckled at Freedom's breast,
He saw in the Past's broad sunset the blood-red light of wrong;
He read out the Future's promise, and summoned mankind to the task,
And the pean he sang at the last was righteous victory's song.

Mourn not, O heroes of Elmwood! Weep not, O my brothers, for him!
The work that he had to do he did, and he sowed immortal seed;
In the hearts of his fellow-countrymen he poured love's wine to the brim;
His monument God has sculptured, in a race of black men freed.

It was not all strength and courage,—he left us some sweetness and light,
And Earth, as he needed the beautiful since Time his circuit began;
With each his own well-ronn'd and finished, he has fought out the good fight;
Let us write no word on his marble, but think what he was as a man.

—Frank Roe Batchelder.

MIRRORS.

The beetle's polished shell
Gives back the far-off sun;
Within the garden well,
When day at last is done,
There is a glimpse of starry skies.
And with the humblest face
That haunts the quiet lea,
A shadow of the grace
That shone from Calvary,
Can live, and speak from out the eyes,

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

Clark.

It would appear that our local university is disposed to restore the word Commencement, to its old time meaning, viz: a beginning rather than an ending of the college year. Tuesday the university year began with addresses by President Hall, and President Carter of Williams; eulogies on Dr. Sargent and General Devens by Dr. E. E. Hall and Colonel Hopkins and the conferring of degrees upon Drs. Bumpus and Nichols. The prospects are encouraging for the coming year.

Dr. J. P. Rand still has his office at 49 Pleasant Street though he has moved his family to 19 Freeland Street.

School and College.

(Held over from last week.)

High School.

Tuesday last was rhetorical day but no formal exercises were held in the hall. The first two hours were however devoted to the study of Oliver Wendell Holmes.

It has become necessary to take another day in the week for the drawing classes. Tuesday, Thursday and Friday will be devoted to that work and a class will also meet Friday afternoon.

The pop-corn man, as of yore, is on hand with his wares and should receive the liberal patronage of the pupils. It certainly is a worthy cause.

Mr. Hector Belisle, who was mentioned last week as pianist, has been relieved of his duties by Miss Mollie Kuddy. Mr. Belisle finds that other duties will prevent his playing, which the pupils will all regret.

Mr. Arthur H. Merriam, who has recently resigned from the Summer Club, gave a supper to his friends last Friday night, at Rebboli's.

The meetings of the clubs were held as usual last Friday. In the afternoon, the Altheia held a largely attended meeting in room six. The following report was carried out:—Piano solo, Miss Chapin; paper:—"Life of Margaret Sydney," Miss Warner; reading, from the works of Magaret Sydney, Miss Jenkinson; extemporaneous address, Miss Harrington. Question:—Resolved, that women have more influence on the morals of a country than men; affirmative:—Miss Walkins, Miss Keith; Negative:—Miss Foster Miss Perry. It was decided in the affirmative.

The attendance at the Summer Club meeting was much improved, there being over thirty-five members present. The programme:—Reading, "The Charity Collector," F. E. Gilbert; declamation, "Col. Cochran's Oration," J. F. Monroe; reading, "A Medley," G. R. Bliss; reading, "An account of an interview with a gutta-percha man," Harry H. Hill.

The Assembly men did not fall from their standard at the last meeting and the attendance last Friday was even an improvement on the week before. The question, "Resolved, That socialism, as embodied in Bellamy's 'Looking Backward' is both practicable and desirable," was debated in the affirmative by W. L. Pentecost, G. B. Knowles, and in the negative by G. W. Mathews, and H. K. Larkin. It was decided in the negative. The remainder of the programme included a declamation, an extemporaneous address and a reading by Messrs. J. F. McGrail, F. A. Stockdale and A. H. Austin respectively, Mr. Reid also read a paper.

The Eucliea met in Room 11 as usual and listened to the following:—Declamation, "St. Gregory's guest," J. O. Tierney; declamation, "The Launching of the Ship," P. J. McLaughlin; declamation, "Erin's Flag," W. J. Murray. The question, Resolved, That the annexation of Cuba to the United States would be beneficial to this country was debated in the affirmative by J. J. Jackson, C. F. Leonard, C. E. Dowd, J. I. Tierney and in the negative by W. J. Foran and W. E. D. Stowe. It was decided in the affirmative.

Holy Cross.

The Rev. Edward I. Devitt, President of

Boston College, visited Holy Cross last Wednesday. His presence was the occasion of a holiday for the students.

The ball team has played two games during the past week and was beaten in both. The nine can hardly be expected to compete with a well organized nine at present. They lack four of last year's nine, including Merritt who is now catching on the Chicago league team. There are many good ball-players among the new comers and it is highly probably that the baseball season of '92 will witness as many creditable victories as did '91.

The Holy Cross boys who left last Monday to enter the Grand Seminary of Montreal received quite a send off from their many friends who gathered at the station to bid farewell.

Smith.

The college opened Friday morning, Sept. 18, with over seven hundred students enrolled. The entering class numbers two hundred and thirty regulars beside many specials. Many were turned away on account of the difficulty of the examinations.

There are but few changes in the Faculty, Fraulein Bende has charge of the German department, during the absence of Frau Kapp, who is in Europe.

The general frolic given specially for the benefit of the Freshmen class was held in the new gymnasium Wednesday evening. The size and beauty of the building was thoroughly appreciated.

There are eight Worcester girls in the entering class, Misses Heald, Harrington, Wood, Estabrook, Stone, Inman, Smith and Sprague.

Mt. Holyoke.

The college opened the 17th with a larger number of students than ever before. The Freshmen class presented one hundred and thirty seekers for knowledge to the friendly arms of Alma Mater. Saturday the Seniors took their seats as usual in chapel. '92 will be comparatively small when it graduates because of the changing of many from the old seminary course to some one of the college courses.

The main building has been greatly improved during the summer months. The chapel has been finished in hard wood, also the north entrance to the dining room and other places.

Many a familiar face is missed among the faculty. Dr. Lowell will take Dr. Frissell's place, Miss Graham will have the classes in psychology and political economy, Miss Mc. Master will take the classes in art and Miss Carter's place in the gymnasium will be taken by Miss Clark, who will teach according to the Delsarte system.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe and Colonel Higginson were guests at the college, Tuesday, while the Woman's Suffrage Convention was held in the village. It is to be feared the young ladies have not fully grasped the idea that their rights have been withheld from them.

Wednesday next, the Seniors will give the Freshmen the opening reception of the year.

Miss Mary Clark and Miss Florence Syvret, W. H. S., '91, enter the college this year.

Boston University.

The college of Liberal Arts opened Thursday, Sept. 17th. The opening address was delivered by Prof. Borden P. Bowne. His words were addressed to the incoming students, and were full of good advice.

There are several changes in the faculty this year. William Cranston Lawton has accepted the chair of Greek at Bowdoin College; and Dr. W. C. Kitchen is pursuing a post-graduate course at Harvard. Prof. A. H. Buck has returned from Athens, where he has been for the past year, and he will resume his work in the Greek department. He will be assisted by Joseph R. Taylor, recently professor in Northwestern University. Mr. Taylor will also assist in the Latin department. Foy Spencer Baldwin, who graduated in '88, has been appointed to a fellowship. He also has charge of the Freshman English class.

John Wenzel, '91, is to have charge of the college library this year, the library being open every afternoon. He will attend lectures in the University Law School mornings.

This year's Freshmen class is very large, there being about eighty entering students.

Jim Putnam.

He was a Sutton man. Queer name, but it was his, solely and truly. His tombstone says so to this day. He was summoned into court, once, and the judge took exceptions to the first name, saying that could not be a Christian name and he was on the point of fining for contempt, but the party says, "That's my name, sure," and his father spoke out in meeting, saying, "Who's right, Judge. That's name, I gave him that myself. I knew if I named him [James they'd call him Jim, so I just named him Jim to begin with and I had him christened that. No body will nick name him now. There's no James about it," and the judge had to hear Jim Putnam's testimony.

A Bit of Literary Criticism.

TO THE EDITOR OF LIGHT:

I find in LIGHT, September 19th, a poem entitled, "Creeds" which reads mischievously like a poem which appeared many years ago in a Newark, N. J., newspaper entitled "What Is His Creed?" The poem alluded to does not bear the author's name, but as a coincidence the similarity is worthy of note. I am able to give two additional stanzas. The second and third stanza in the appended copy being omitted in the poem by E. P. Powell, taken from Liberty and Life. Much interest is manifested by some of your readers as to the authorship of this "double," found. The quotation marks in your copy are duly observed, but if these are attributable to E. P. Powell, the question is incorrect and the "double undid him."

Permit me to call further attention to his adoption of the last four lines of the second stanza of my version, with which to close his third verse; also, the transpositions occurring throughout the poem. It may be seen that the version in LIGHT, suffers in a translation of sense. Which is the original poem? The following is a copy of my version.

What Is His Creed?

He left a load of anthracite

In front of a poor woman's door,

When the deep snow, frozen and white,

Wrapped street and square, mountain and moor.

That was his deed;

He did it well;

"What was his creed?"

I cannot tell.

Blessed "in his basket and in his store,"

In sitting down and rising up;

When mote he got he gave the more,

Withholding not the crust and cup.

He took the lead

In each good task.

"What was his creed?"

I did not ask.

His charity was like the snow.

Soft, white, and silent in its fall;

Not like the noisy winds that blow

From shivering trees the leaves: a pall

For flowers and weed,

Drooping below.

"What was his creed?"

The poor may know.

He had great faith in leaves of bread;

For hungry people, young and old;

And hope inspired, kind words he said.

To those he sheltered from the cold.

For we must feed

As well as pray.

"What was his creed?"

I cannot say.

In words he did not put his trust,

His faith in words he never wist;

He loved to share his cup and crust.

With all mankind who needed it.

In time of need

A friend was he.

"What was his creed?"

He told not me.

He put his trust in Heaven, and he Worked well with hand and head;

And what he gave in charity

Sweetened his sleep and daily bread.

Let us take heed

For life is brief.

"What was his creed?"

"What his belief?"

Heroines, Julien Gordon; A Tiffin with a Taotai, Edward Bedloe; October, Florence Earle Coates; The Bells of San Gabriel, Gertrude Franklin Atherton; A Minor Chord, Ella Wheeler Wilcox; Dream and Deed, Katharine Lee Bates; The Common Roads of Europe, John Gilmer Speed; "Sea-Bird of the Broken Wing," Roden Noel; Sonnet upon Courbet's Picture "The Wave," R. T. W. Duke, Jr.; With Washington and Wayne, Melville Phillips; The Lost "Landfall" of Columbus, William Agnew Paton; Divided, Helen Grace Smith; Humanitarian Hours, Lillian North; Rhymes of Childhood," R. M. Johnson.

The appearance of the magazine is greatly enhanced this month by the introduction of illustrations. The frontispiece is a fine portrait of George W. Childs. And the article, With Washington and Wayne, is accompanied by two full page pictures on extra fine paper, and others in the text. The story is told in a very entertaining manner. The Landfall of Columbus is the island on which he first stepped, and its identification is now a question of doubt. A Tiffin with a Taotai needs explanation. It is nothing more than a dinner in high society in China. Of course every one will read the story. It is bright and breezy and with plenty of go in it, and compares most favorably with the other popular novels of the widely-read author, the Duchess.

Those who are interested in the relations between the United States and Canada will find very much worth engaging their attention in an article on the late Sir John Macdonald in the October Atlantic, written by Mr. Martin J. Griffin, Librarian of the Library of Parliament, Ottawa, who writes with a full knowledge of the late premier and personal acquaintance with him.

The well-known humorist Edgar Wilson Nye, better known by the name of "Bill Nye," which was bestowed upon him many years ago by brother journalists in California, will contribute to The Century during the coming year a series of articles descriptive of his experiences in different parts of America and in various capacities. He calls them his "Autobiographies," and the first one, "The Autobiography of a Justice of the Peace," will appear in the November Century. It is understood that Mr. Nye has not drawn so largely as is usual with him upon his powers of invention, but has endeavored to present a series of pictures of American life which will both amuse and instruct.

A new feature has just been introduced in the New England Magazine. It is, "In a Corner at Dodsley's," a gossip about writers and books by Walter Blackburn Harte, which is as frank and unconventional in tone as any of the political articles from his pen that have made his name familiar.

The Pansy. Edited by Isabella M. and G. R. Alden. Published by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

The new volume will begin with the next number and from the prospectus we think will be quite equal in interest to the one just closing. There are to be several continued stories by well known and loved writers for children, and, in fact a deal is promised for the coming year. In this number all will turn to the continued story of "Twenty minutes late" and will wonder whether Caroline finally decides to stay where she is, or go home. There are portraits of some famous people, and the short stories and the letter box are fully up to any number preceding. Price $1.00 per year.

Wide Awake from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, Mass.

The frontispiece is a picture of Edith Southby, showing her to be a lovely girl. The finest article in this book is a sketch of the three maids of the lakes of which she was one. There are portraits of the others, Sara Coleridge and Dora Wordsworth. The first story is a thrilling adventure with Russian wolves by Lieut. Col. Thorndike. There are three Natural History articles ever so many stories both short and continued, among them being the Pepper story, and three chapters of Miss Matilda Archangeau Van Dorn. The fine pictures and poems make up a thoroughly good number which any one may have for the small sum of 20 cents, or a year for $2.40.

Good Housekeeping. From Clark Bryan & Co., Springfield, Mass.

We think it is not only that this magazine contains in the way of reading matter that makes it so popular every where, but its neat and attractive appearance. It is of convenient size, the print is clear, and at the beginning of every article is a fancy initial, or a unique headpiece, that tells at a glance what the reader has in store for him. For instance, in a three page paper on tomatoes the head-piece shows a housekeeper just screwing the top on a can which she has presumably filled with preserve. "Ten Mornings in a Kitchen," shows the room with its furniture. "Care of the Skin," has a bowl and pitcher with a towel. The story, "Life in a Flat" has the mistress waiting for her callers who will not come when she is at home, but persist in leaving a card when she is out. So all the way through, the endless variety both in the reading and the setting will strike one as does no other magazine of its size. Its price, too, is another good thing, it being only $2.40 a year.

St. Nicholas for Young Folks, from the Century Co., New York.

The first article is full of pictures of cats and dogs, besides a portrait of the artist. J. H. Dolph. Any lover of pets will thoroughly appreciate these pictures. Nobody will skip the story of Toby Trafford which comes to an end, this number bringing the hero out all right, and disposing of all the characters in a satisfactory manner. A curious relic deals with an old figure head and to the lovers of the antique, it is well worth reading. The eastern story also closes this month with the capture of the pirates. There is a page or two of the folklore stories; an article for athletes in "Little Plunket's Cousin," something nice about Hans Andersen, a ridiculous tale of the clock, the King, and his court and people, a child's adventure in the west, an article on Black Art, and a paper on "Books of Olden times" taking the old methods of writing and later the binding. All these papers are fully illustrated, and the poems and correspondence make a number that may well end the volume. The index is also in this month. Price is $3.00 per year and it is well worth all that one gives.

A Classic Town: The story of Evanston by Francis E. Willard, Woman's Temperance Publishing Association. Chicago, 1891. $1.50.

An interesting theme is this book treated by a complete mistress and then the publisher has taken the matter in hand, producing an unusually attractive volume. It is a nearly square 12mo of 423 pages, profusely adorned with specimens of the engraver's art. Evanston is the seat of the Northwestern University, one of the most important institutions in America. Here Miss Willard was, for many years, at the head of the women's portion of the University and in Evanston, she still has a home. Consequently, she knows this beautiful city like a book, just like the book she has written concerning it. Of course it is not so large a book as her Reminiscences, but it is quite as interesting. Local history, as a rule, has only a local value and patronage but in this case, subject, writer and manner combine to make Evanston attractive everywhere. The town is an accompaniment of the University and came after the college, a condition that would pretty well do away with the contests so frequently waged 'twixt town and gown. Located on the shores of Lake Michigan, just out of Chicago, Evanston has an exceptionally beautiful situation and it has grown to be an exceptionally beautiful city. Miss Willard narrates the incidents of the founding of the College and city and the many parts of the latter accompanying the description, in many cases by excellent pictures of face, building or street. There are no less than sixty-three faces given and twenty buildings. Many people thus pictured are those known to fame, as Dr. John Evans, one of the founders, Orrington Lunt, who selected the site, Dr. Joseph Cummings, late President of the University and other officers of the University, with some Chicago workers whose homes are in the Classic Town. Any one, knowing aught of Miss Willard's mastery of style would expect from her an entertaining book on any theme, but in this she has excelled herself. She has made of her "Classic Town" a classic in literature. It is sold by subscription and Miss Ruth Pellet is the agent for this city.

The Atlantic Monthly for October is of unusual interest to Worcester readers in that it contains an article by a former Worcester resident, Col. T. W. Higginson and that he refers to people once well known in our midst. The piece in question is "Emily Dickinson's Letters." She was the niece of Mr William Dickinson, formerly so well known here. It seems that the poet had written to the then "Rev." T. W. Higginson and he was obviously much puzzled by the tenor of these letters. He says: "Circumstances, however, soon brought me in contact with an uncle of Emily Dickinson, a gentleman now now living; a prominent citizen of Worcester, a man of integrity and character, who shared her abruptness and impulsiveness but certainly not her poetic temperament, from what he was indeed singularly remote. He could tell but little of her, she being, evidently, an enigma to him as to me." To readers in this city, this beginning ought to be sufficient to prompt a most absorbing interest in these letters which are curiosities of the rarest type. She inclines to her mentor, for such she obviously rates Mr. Higginson, some of her stanzas and beautiful some of them are. Was ever any thing written, prettier than this?

The Humming Bird.

"A route of evanescence
With a revolving wheel
A resonance of emerald
A rush of cochineal
And every blossom on the bush
Adjusts its tumbled head,
The mail from Tantis probably,
An easy morning's ride."

Her poems have gone through six editions in six months. At last, the mentor meets his pupil and this is the description. "After a litte delay, I heard an exceedingly faint and prattling footstep like that of a child in the hall, and in glided almost noiselessly a plain, shy little person, the face without a single good feature, but with eyes, as she herself said, 'like the sherry the guest leaves in the glass' and with smooth bands of reddish chestnut hair. . . . She came toward me with two day lilies which she put in a childlike way into my hand, saying softly, under her breath, 'These are my introduction.'" The description of the father whom the writer knew only from his picture is singularly applicable to his brother, our late Worcester resident. Had the Atlantic only this article, telling of Emily Dickinson, it still would be one of the best numbers of the year.

Augustus Jones, Jr., The Little Brother and other stories. By Fitz Hugh Ludlow, Lee & Shepard, Boston, 50 cts.

It is claimed that there are more people who can write good long stories that can catch and hold the attention in short ones. This is undoubtedly true, but when the writer of this book was living, there was at least one man who could rivet the attention of his reader from the very onset and hold it to the end. If there ever was a brighter story than "Little Brother" then it never came in LIGHT's way. He was a jewel of a boy, yet there are hundreds of boys just like him playing about our streets every day, only they are not written up. Ludlow's humor is of that lasting character that it is just as keen and bright today as it was thirty years ago. His boy was one of the universal kind. They are not effected by the mutations of time. "Fleeing to Tarshish," "Little Briggs and I" and "A Brace of Boys" are of the same general style as "Little Brother." Many a mother has read these stories and lived over again the childhood of the men of business of today. The reader will very likely grow red around the lashes, at times, but tears will soon give way to smiles. Ludlow pushed the world a long way into the sunshine.

A CHARACTERISTIC.

I met a dog the other day
Upon a corner crossing,
Who bore the marks of bloody fray
And quite a recent tossing.

The cuts were thick upon his back,
One eye was closed completely,
And leaving growl with every track,
Along he moved obliquely

A drop lurked within the eye
With which he navigated
And though run down by passers by,
Not he who exasperated.

Now, when a man is thus indigne
And like-sees gett'ing indigne,
The ear he wants of everyone
And chance to do his talking.

And though the dog I met to-day
Would halt and gaze about his way,
To none had hea word to say
Indeed he was dumfounded.

— Herr Cherrys.

Back to the Old Home.

Such a dear old house it was! Nestling down in an old-fashioned garden, with an orchard full of weather-beaten apple trees behind it, while an outer circle of ancient cedars drew up about it like faithful guardians, the low, white house, with its broad wings, made you think of a mother bird brooding over her well-filled nest. But the nestlings were all gone now, had wandered far from the old house, which seemed to them shabbier and more cramped every time they came back for a visit.

Only grandma clung to it closer and closer as the years went by. When the busy sons and fashionable daughters called it lonely, and the grandchildren wondered over its queer little cuddly holes, and remarked with open contempt upon the stiff old furniture and tiny-paneled windows, the old lady listened and said nothing, but her heart throbbled with pain as though she had heard the maligning of some dear friend.

"They don't, of course, know," she thought, excusing them in her gentle way. "Though to other eyes it may seem poor and old-fashioned, to me it never can be so, for it is the first, the only home I ever had." And after the sad, tender manner of the old, who only have a happy past and empty present without a lurid future here, she fell a-dreaming of by-gone times, when her faithful John had brought her a bride to this dear home, which seemed so grand and beautiful then, after an orphaned childhood and girlhood without a settled home.

How could it ever seem lonely and humble to her, when it was so rich in a thousand happy, blessed associations? Had not she and John planted that very mountain ash together? Had not that been John's favorite rose bush? And could the rooms ever seemed empty and cramped to her, when every nook and corner spoke to her, sometimes of the living or the dead, as eloquently as tongue could do?

Here was where she used to sit and watch the fire on Winter evenings, rocking the cradle with her foot, while she toasted the bread John liked brown to a shade. This dark spot on the worn floor was where Baby May had turned the ink over while she sat writing to the soldier father far away, where the Pottomac rolled its bloody waters. And here beside the centre-table, on which lay the well-thumbed family Bible, she had knelt and prayed for twenty years with John, prayed with her little ones in tearful grief when he was gone, prayed for them when they slipped from her arms out into the world, and where she still nightly beat her stiff, old knees to pray for them and theirs.

Grandma only loved the old house better as the years rolled by, but when old Phoebe, who had been half servant, half companion to the old lady, died, it was decided in family council that she must really make up her mind to live with one or the other of them, and it was out of all question her remaining in that gloomy old house all alone.

So one sad day, overpowered by the sons and daughters who meant to be kind, grandma went softly to and fro over the old house, taking leave of it all, and the last of the farewells was the visit paid to the two mounds under the oak, where John slept and the first-born little son. Then, with a feeling that the world had come to an end, grandma drove away to the fine big residence—they don't call them homes now—where Henry and Henry's wife, who, for all her kindness, rather overpowered grandma with her fine ways, had given her a stately room, and, what was most dreadful, a maid! A maid that called her "Madame" and for "Yes" said "Oui!"

Yes, they meant to be kind to her, but the gray stone pile and the maid gave the old lady the feeling that she was in an asylum and had a keeper, and in spite of all the grandeur, grandma's wrinkled cheeks lost their soft pink, like that of a half-withered rose, and she grew feeble and worn, though every one was so busy that it passed unnoticed. She was pining for the old home, though she felt it would be ungrateful to say so, and somehow to pray in the magnificent church, where she sat in a velvet-cushioned pew, did not seem to give her help, for God was not close to her, she thought, as He used to be when she knelt at home. If she could only go back and tell her friend all about it, just once kneeling where John seemed to come and join her! This feeling grew and grew, though as there was no one to tell it to, she shut it up in her own lonely heart.

One morning the French maid came running down to the family with great excitement in her dark face, and in broken English informed them that "Madame had slept not in her couch, nor could Celeste find her anywhere, though she search, she searched everywhere?"

Then Henry recollected all at once that he had rather neglected his mother lately. "Mrs. Henry forgot her "cultured" calmness and joined in the search, whispering bitterly. Jane came running in with reproaches for herself and all the others. Joe left his desk for once and set telegraph wires to work, and confusion and grief reigned supreme, while the sons and daughters found their minds wandering back to childhood and "mother," as they had not done for years, and I think they learned over again, and far more perfectly, the lesson of filial love.

Hours passed, and no news came of the missing, and fears grew graver and stronger, till at last Henry, walking the floor in anxiety, exclaimed suddenly, as the idea struck him—"She's gone home!" and running to a draw in his desk, where keys of every size and form lay bunched and singly, he turned them hastily over.

"Yes the key is gone, and she has wandered back home. I'm sure of it. Why we did not think of it before, I cannot think. Oh, mother! you never wanted to leave it, the dear, dear old house where we were born, and which sheltered us all so faithfully. And we dragged you from it, selfish dolts!"

"Too impatient to wait for trains not due for hours, they set off across the country in carriages. As they drew near the old house they found news of the lost one. She had passed only an hour before, plodding wearily along the familiar road, so with lightened hearts they went on.

Leaving carriage and horse at the village, they followed the rest of the way on foot.

When they came to the swinging white gate through the wet grass they saw a pathway trodden by one who had visited the long mound, with the tiny one beside it, under the oak, but they also saw that she had gone thence to the house. So, weeping softly, and not ashamed of the tears either, the party tipped like children up the low, wide steps, through the hall, and paused reverently at the door, with remoral hearts that longed to tell that gentle old mother, as they had once done over some childish disobedience, that they "were sorry, mother."

The stillness in the old house grew oppressive while they stood uncertain, and though they listened, there was no faint footfall as of one going about after the fashion of one just getting home. They pushed softly open the door of the old sitting-room, and there, with her white head on the open Bible and a smile of joy and peace upon her dead face, knelt grandma, who had gone home to find welcome from her John already there.—Philadelphia Times.

ZEK'EL BROWN UNBURDENS HIMSELF.

The neatest woman in this town,
Folks say I've got for a wife;
And what folks say is gospel truth
This time you bet your life.

Keturah Brown she beats the world
On bakin' bread an' pies,
But her best bolt is fightin' dirt
And circumventin' lies.

Her temper's like her pie-crust, which They're both uncommon short;
An' tho' I'm free-and-easy like
Sometimes she makes me snoot.

There aint no sense in havin' things
So dum'd-all-fired neat,
Nor sayin' ev'ry time I step,
"Now, Zek'el, wipe your best!"

I can't set down in our feet room,
It is so slick an' spruce;

Fact is, most everything we've got's
For good for common use.

Though next to godliness the Book
Puts cleanliness, I'm bound
To say Keturah's mighty apt
To run it in the ground.

There aint no use in kickin' 'em
Prepared to bear my cross;
Some day, perhaps, I'll wear my crown;
Keturah she can't best.

Things round in Heaven. An' since we're told,
That there no moth nor rust
Comes to corrupt, I guess its safe
To say there aint no dust.

But oh, what will Keturah do
Within those peary gates,
If she no longer finds the dirt
That she so dearly hates?
O'ershadowed Heaven itself will be,
Engulfed in awful gloom,
When my Keturah enters in
And cannot use a broom.

A New Psalm.

The faults of juxtaposition were well illustrated recently when a teacher at the High School had certain dictation work put upon the board and, run along together, the result was as follows, "Ichadod involuntarily broke into a Psalm tune, Dread Olympus was turned into a buckleberry hill." The pupils are wondering yet just where that Psalm can be found.

"My father will leave me nothing to do."

Our Street Railway Service.

BY H. KINGSBURY MAY.

In 1885, eighteen years after the incorporation of the Worcester Street Railway Company, it was the owner of a few mediæval bad cars, whose pre-historic attributes linked them with a past, sacred in its hallowed antiquity, operating a line of about four miles in length, in a city with a population nearing 80,000. Our South end friends will never forget the picturesque, grotesque and burlesque variety of improvised vehicles impressed into service to help resuscitate this Kip Van Winkle corporation from its somnambulant death. We recall no profanity more redolent with the sulphuric protechnics of complete disgust than that of the present president of the Street Railway Company; yet, no lost soul ever revelled in profanity, that more resplendently embellished a subject so forgivingly burdened with self-justification. Here was a business opportunity in the hands of this corporation hardly second to none in the city: a monopoly, competitor-less, and the right of way through every important street to be had, without price, simply for the asking, and this network of streets, in a progressive city whose population was fast nearing 100,000. Surely, this Alpine business imbecility has no recorded duplicate in the history of American street railway service. In the mirror of comparison we see the intensified reality of the supreme wretchedness of this wretched service, which was a total eclipse in the firmament of street railway aspirations.

Exhibit A, practically includes every community in the United States of over 8,000 inhabitants having four miles, and a fraction thereof, of street railway service. In this classification of the cities, town, and villages, standing on an equality of street railway mileage, with our own city, with its then population of nearly 80,000, and considering the population of these various communities, we clearly see the exact rank of our local service in 1885.

Can there be found among the wreckage of business opportunities, a sadler confession of pitiable imbecility, than this company's own history, written by itself, in its own official reports?

In 1885, the dry rot of the Worcester Street Railway Company attracted the attention of Fall River and other investors. The incorporation of the Citizens' Street Railway Company was the immediate result. The Board of Aldermen never more gladly granted a franchise, so fraught with encouraging hope. The new company quickly rolled the streets of its choice, and set rolling stock in motion, the like never before seen in the streets of Worcester; there was a business snap and energy that characterized all its movements, so refreshingly in contrast with the hide-bound shuffling of the old company, so tenaciously encased within its shell of penurious contentment. The fate of the Citizens' Company is common knowledge; the old company opened its mouth, and the new company submissively assented, at a price, to be the Jonah; but swallowing this morsel of business energy made it possible for the old company to squirm a little livelier, and time has proved the efficaciousness of one dose of modern street railway tonic.

Assuming that our present service, so vastly increased under the impetus referred to, includes a trackage of twenty miles, it is interesting to see into what group of cities our service falls as it is today.

Exhibit B includes those cities in the United States whose service is relatively the same in mileage or approximately near that of our own.

Is it not painfully apparent that our service will not bear the test of neighborly comparison, and that the city's deficiency in street railway service is a serious obstacle to her material growth and progressive expansion?

Is the service such as a busy community, pressing on to 100,000, with its multiplying needs, demands? Is the service, today, proving its value, as an up-building factor, in the cluster of material forces, now pushing the city into greater prominence? Is our service even loyal to the city's interests?

Unless it can be conclusively established that the citizens of Worcester are pre-eminently a distinctive non-street-car-riding class, that as a business investment the service is unremunerative, then it must be a just inference that she requires only one-half the mileage of the cities of her class.

Is the local service sustained? The company's own answer, in its last official report, shows a rare precedent in its possibility, of an eight per cent dividend. For the year ending Sept. 30, 1890, it is officially stated that the company carried 4,851,574 persons, receiving therefor $2,324,755, yielding a net income, above operating expenses of $57,017.

Do we not here clearly see the unmistakable evidence of public loyalty? In these days of doubtful investments, an eight per cent. dividend, honestly earned, and honestly paid, means a business success, hence the company's lack of vitality is not due to a lack of financial support.

As the company has conspicuously failed to rise to the level of its opportunity in the past, it is only reasonable to assume that it will never find itself in complete sympathy and touch with the spirit of progressive unrest that permeates every on-rushing purpose in the up-building of our beautiful city. To have such a corporate lag-gard, aimlessly and brainlessly shuffling through our streets, whose only creed is that of selfish inflation of a hopeful and grasping vendor, is one of the greatest misfortunes that could overtake a progressive people.

Under the conditions, then, as they exist today, in what direction must the city look for a live street car service, a pushing, aggressive agency. Possibly, to the Worcester, Leicester and Spencer Street Railway Company. May this corporation never so desecrate its charter, as to stultify every instinct that points to a realization of the public necessity for its own existence nor for a quarter of a century pickle itself in the indolent brine of the corrodent rust of business imbecility. The electric service of the Worcester, Leicester and Spencer Street Railway Company comes to the city at most opportune time, the harvest season of street railway possibilities. With a broad, intelligent and aggressive management in the absorption of waiting streets in every part of the city; in the wisdom of linking these beautiful suburban localities with the centre, this company can lay the foundation of Worcester deeper than it has yet been laid.

May the opening of the Worcester, Leicester and Spencer road prove to be the resurrection morn of the full fruition of hope, the redemption of our "quick transit" system. No review of our street railway service would be just, that did not gratefully recognize the valued service of our respected citizen, Hon. Charles B. Pratt, who six years ago consecrated himself to the holy purpose of lifting our service from nothing to something, and whatever of merit there is in it today is due more directly to him than to any other person. In his peculiar environment of foreign capital he has earned the enduring gratitude of every appreciative citizen. To have increased the mileage five fold, under such limitations, is indeed a notable record. Unfettered, and emancipated from New York unsympathetic capital, he would be the right man in the right place and one of the city's greatest benefactors.

We gladly record the public's appreciation of the opening of the electric railway to the Lake, within the past few days, and we would not withhold from the Consolidated Street Railway Company the great credit in taking one step of business energy in 1891. Would that it might continue to electrify our impatient roadways. We also welcome the North End Street Railway Company, and we congratulate it upon its successful opening within the past few days. Surely these latter days have been radiant with the spirit of street railway awakening, and whose repentant conviction seems to be rampant.

Out of this recent infusion of street railway virus, may the body politic have speedy issue from local street railway stagnation.

An Unfashionable Resort.

Perhaps the island least known to the world, though the largest of the group of 365 that lies within Casco Bay, is that of Great Chebeague. Perchance some of the readers of LIGHT may never have had an opportunity to visit this secluded section of the world, I will let fall from my pen a few drops of ink in which you may find reflected not only the material island itself but also a glimpse of the inhabitants.

About midway between the City of Portland and the famous Orr's Island, it lies some nine miles from the former place. A bird's-eye view would reveal to the observer an island some five miles in length, of irregular shape dotted here and there by one-story, unpainted farm-houses with occasionally a house of more modern aspect. As one approaches from Portland the first impression received is that of a rocky, wooded island, the general surface of which is many feet above the sea, but a closer examination, as one passes along its shore towards the east reveals that the rocks and woods of Deer Point, which first arrested his attention, form only a small section of the island. The general character of the soil is fertile, sloping gradually toward the sea in unbroken meadow-land, but is intersected here and there by long ledges of rock, many of them extending across its whole width.

My place of stopping while upon the island was in one of these low, unattractive farm-houses that stood upon a spot high above the sea, overlooking the open ocean.

Life here is uneventful, the stillness broken only by the songs of the birds, and the constant roar of the tide upon the shore. The silence verges almost upon that of the death chamber throughout a day of fog. Welcome is the time when the sun again pierces its lower strata and it begins to rise as though some spirit above had grasped the upper corners of the veil and was quickly drawing it up, as a curtain rises, revealing to the vision once again nature decked in its brightest robe. As the veil is lifted let the reader step with me from the front door of this ancient farm-house, out upon the ledge just below the house, that rises perpendicularly many feet above the sea. What do we behold? The first object of interest is the long strip of coast made irregular by the numberless points of rocks that extend far out into the water and between each two of which lies a little cove, with its pebbled beach thickly studded with the tiny yellow shell found everywhere along the coast of Maine.

Then, as the scene expands, may be seen just beneath the fog, both Long and Little Chebeague islands to the west, while eastward lie the sloping meadows and the rocky projection of Deer Point. At last the vision is uninterrupted and just within the horizon may be seen Harpswell Neck to the east and a section of the mainland near to Portland to the west, while immediately ahead lies the broad expanse of open ocean.

But now that the reader has before him a view of the island and its surroundings let us look a moment at the human element. The natives are, when classed as a whole, a shiftless, lawless people, many families living at the very door of starvation simply from lack of energy to earn a good living. Nature yields here an abundance of the necessities of life, at their very doors as it were, if they would but stretch forth their hands and grasp her product. But, instead they sit beneath their roofs in lazy enjoyment, smoking and dozing hours away. Let no one think, however, that the entire population of Chebeague belongs to this class, though a large percentage does. Some are fishermen, some farmers, the latter outnumbering the former. A most noticeable feature to the stranger is the primitive manner in which farming is carried on. One might almost imagine himself back in the days of fifty or sixty years ago. There being but few horses on the island, ploughing and harvesting are carried on by the aid of slow moving oxen and hand labor. The creamery, or any of the improved methods of dairying are wholly unknown to them. Water is carried into but few of the houses, the old time custom of drawing from the well with buckets still prevailing. The most well-to-do farmer on the island still draws all his water in this manner.

But little thought is given to education though in the two small school houses the simple rudiments of the common branches are taught. Two plain houses, small and of quaint architecture, constitute the church homes of the islanders, and here each Sunday morning many of them congregate to listen to the word of God. Though to outward appearances many of them seem so indifferent to a higher sphere of living yet there lives within them one trait deserving mention: a trait which I fear is far less apparent among people of higher aspirations. It is their feeling of gratitude for any kindness done them. The simple words of thankfulness in response to the merest act in their behalf, are not, as we so often hear, mere words, but rather seem to be an expression of deep feeling from the heart under an uncomely covering. If in the mirror of my little drop of ink the reader finds a sufficiently clear reflection of the island of Great Chebeague to study more fully in respect to its details, let me leave you here still perusing one of the most beautiful spots along the coast of Maine.

Barbarous.

My own taste may have been at fault, but I saw a lawn decoration one day last summer that struck me as being singularly inappropriate and even barbaric. On either side of a well kept carriage drive at the side of the lawn and leading up to a side door were rows of cobble stones, as large as a half bushel measure and these stones were painted red, white and blue, and around each stone was a row of glaringly white sea shells. I leave the general effect to your imagination.

On either side of the path leading to the front door were so called "gypsy kettles", which were really two dinner pots painted a vivid red hanging from three equally red sticks fastened together at the top. It was not Fourth of July or Bunker Hill day or any other day when such decoration would have been appropriate for a few hours, but in size flaunted from the top of the "gypsy kettle" poles, while a pair of huge tin centur plants painted a vivid green were set in large red vases near the gate. There was not a flower to be seen.—J. L. H. in Vick Magazine for September Continuity of Life.

There is a continuity of life,
 And all this turmoil, and this endless strife,
 If entered and maintained with purpose true,
 Will spiritualize, and swift insure a new
 And broader field of life beyond the grave.
 Those here who meet all earthly ills, and brave
 The elements that would enslave the soul,
 That dwarf, and hinder from a perfect whole,
 Are counted victors there in truest sense,
 Enrobed in white, the type of innocence.
 Think not your well-earned future rest means sloth,
 A garden plot for sin! Heaven is worth
 With soil that doth invite the seeds of sin,
 And proves receptive to all shades; therein
 Is growth prolific, and its magnitude
 Appalls us, and we see the jagged, rude,
 And devious ways that dim the bright beyond.
 In that beyond is work to seal the bond
 That binds us to the Infinite; there peace
 And rest, well earned through faithful work, release
 Through our own active will, from slavish sin,
 From impress that such sinful life will win.
 Until we stand like monarchs in a realm
 Where right is might, and good will overwhelm
 The stain we name as sin, but all is good.
 Sin is the law of good misunderstanding,
 A rash perversion, or abuse of law,
 Which we, in blindness, as an evil saw,
 Accounted as an element distinct.
 And gave it future life and vast pre-ict,
 Where subjects writhed in torment night and day
 And bent in homage to a demon's sway
 O, dread delusion that has dwarfed the mind
 'Tis thin and shadowy as the changing wind,
 And yet, the seer is for such a special place.
 We live, and breathe, and have this saving grace,
 To shape our ends as suits our own behest,
 To die a sinner, or be counted blest.
 'Tis in our hands to shape our future life,
 To live, and act like heroes in the strife.
 And yet, the seer is for such a special place,
 Meet with a coward's front, and we k debate
 The varied paths, that from our birth accrue,
 Divergent paths in this life and the new Nay, may we know and never cease to feel
 An impulse that will show increasing zeal
 To fan with noble deeds the spark of life,
 And to a loftier sphere our lives incline.
 If we can boast the God within as born,
 We then can claim to laugh all frie: d as scorn,
 If we are but an atom from th: it source
 Whose laws are proved an over-ruling for e
 Then we are God, and have the power to be Rulers of s-ll through all eternity.
 Demean not God by calling self a slave,
 But rather kindly lend toward life I've gave.
 If we are God we have an endless life,
 And we can prove it with all lifesinging rife
 If I can see His handwork of love,
 Can look, with upturned face, to skies above,
 Have strength to scan each passing, fleeting cloud,
 Nor think it needful I my face must shroud,
 Why should I bend as if in abject fear
 'To Him who girds with suns his beautiful dear?
 Nay, I will keep my soul so white, and and pure
 That even to the erd I can endure
 To see God's face within the changing skies,
 I will not droop my lids to veil mine eyes,
 Nor grovel in the dust on beaded knee.
 My gracious God has made a king of me,
 And when I see in nature, joy and grace,
 And know the worth of earth's abiding place,
 That I am blest with power to know and be,
 And that eysian fields are waiting me,
 My soul is filled with suns beautiful pride
 The God within me will not let me hide,
 But in my heart is one seraphic song,
 That if I will I can avoid the wrong.
 —Mrs. A. H. Hinman.

A comfort in a sickroom is a wooden bed-rest, which, when placed behind the pillows, enables the patient to sit up easily. Another contrivance which I have seen answer admirably is a very long net, the ends of which were fastened to the bedposts, and, being passed behind the patient and containing the pillows, formed a secure means of resting him when sitting up.

Good to Eat.

Brown Cake.

One cupful of good brown sugar, three eggs beaten separately, half a cup of butter, half a cup of molasses, half a cup of strong cold coffee, three cups of sifted flour, one teaspoonful of baking powder, one cup of chopped raisins and one cup of currants, one teaspoonful each of ground cinnamon, cloves and mace; bake in jelly cake pans. For the white part take two cups of white sugar, one of butter, three cups of flour, half a cup of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of baking powder, and the whites of four eggs; bake in jelly pans, and put together alternately with the dark, spreading icing flavored with vanilla between; ice on top.—Ballou's Magazine.

Citron Preserves

Pare deeply and cut the citron into any fancy shape you desire. Weigh and allow a pound of sugar to each one of fruit. Boil the fruit rapidly for twenty minutes in a strong solution of alum water (made by dissolving alum in hot water).

Skim the fruit out into cold water, where it should remain until next day.

Skim out of the alum-water and boil in clear water until soft and clear looking.

Make the syrup and when it boils add the fruit and the juice of one lemon for every two pounds of fruit. Fifteen minutes is usually long enough to boil the fruit in the syrup.

Grape Preserves.

Squeeze the pulp from the skins, saving the latter.

Boil the pulp slowly for ten or fifteen minutes, then rub through a collander to remove the seeds. Add a very little water to the skins and boil them fifteen minutes.

Allow one pound of sugar to each pint of pulp, and add both to the boiling skins, and boil the whole together fifteen minutes, stirring constantly to prevent its adhering to the kettle.—Washington Home Magazine.

How to make fruit cake that will last a year or more is important to every housekeeper. One pound of currants should be washed and drained thoroughly; one pound of raisins should be likewise treated and then chopped finely after the pits have been taken out; chop also half a pound of citron. Leave this fruit until the last. Make the cake part as follows: Beat five eggs and two cups of brown sugar together, add one cup of butter, one of molasses, half cup of sour milk, and spices to suit the taste. Stir six cups of flour in this mixture, and then add fruit, mixing another half-cup of flour at the same time to prevent settling.—Boston Budget.

pudding Worth Eating.

There are rice puddings and rice puddings. The old-fashioned one, if made in the right way, is not to be "sneezed at." The following one is vouched for by Mrs. Rorer, principal of the Philadelphia cooking school. Add two heaping tablespoonfuls of washed rice, same quantity of sugar, a quarter of a grated nutmeg, and a half cup of raisins to a quart of new milk; place it in a moderate oven and cook slowly for about two hours, stirring every fifteen minutes for the first hour and a half, the last half hour the oven should be sufficiently hot to form a thin, papery crust of a deep brown shade on the top; the pudding when done should be creamy, not solid.

Household.

Neuralgia is a most distressing complaint but it is often relieved by simple remedies. Wring clothes out of hot water to which salt and a few spoonfuls of ammonia have been added, apply the hot clothes to the part affected, change when cold until the pain is gone, then cover with a warm soft cloth to prevent taking cold.

Another good remedy is to paint the place of pain with the oil of peppermint using a camel's hair brush. Half a drachm of ammonia in a goblet of water with gum camphor dissolved in the water, a teaspoon to be taken internally, quantity of camphor, a piece the size of a pea. It generally gives relief. An excellent liniment for neuralgia is one ounce of sweet oil, one ounce of strong water of ammonia five drops turpentine, mix well, to be rubbed on with flannel every half hour until the pain is gone. If the pain is very severe in the side of the head two drops of laudanum in half teaspoonful warm water, dropped in the ears will generally give instant relief.

For sore throat. Chloride of potash, dissolved in water, is a standard remedy. A gargle made of salt and vinegar, with a little cayenne pepper, mixed together, will often cure a sore throat, combined with hoarseness. It stimulates the glands and promotes free secretion, and thus relieves the hoarseness. When the throat begins to feel a little sore, a piece of gum camphor as large as a pea kept in the mouth until dissolved will often cure it. (Some doctors say if the gum is used in season it would always prevent diphtheria). The symptoms of diphtheria are chills, a slight fever at the beginning of the disease, stiff neck and inflammation of throat, gray colored spots show on the inflamed parts. The voice sounds husky, the pulse is small and quick, in some patients the countenance will be full and bloated, in others pale and sunken. At this stage of the disease if the patient does not receive immediate treatment the putrid symptoms appear.

In the first stage of the disease give a cathartic and give one every third day as the putrid secretions must be thoroughly evacuated. Induce a free perspiration and apply to the throat and chest, a wash made as follows: one-half pint good cider vinegar, one-half cup of the grease tried out of salt pork, one teaspoonful of salaratus or soda, boil all together a few minutes, then apply with a flannel. Change as often as the flannel cools. If these directions are followed in the first stages of the disease the putrid symptoms will not appear at all. Keep the patient in bed and have the air warm, but have it very pure and avoid all draughts.

One of the best methods of cleaning hair brushes is to put a full teaspoonful of household ammonia into a basin of warm water. Dip the bristles in and rub briskly with the hand, or better still, with another brush. When thoroughly cleansed put in the sun to dry bristle-side up. Two brushes may be thus readily cleansed at once.—Boston Budget.

Our Marshal.

City Marshal Washburn of that city, a candid, conscientious man but not a radical on the temperance question, not six weeks ago in answer to the inquiry by the writer, "Was there as much liquor sold and drunk, or so many arrests made, in Worcester under the no-licenses regime as in the years when licenses were granted," he promptly replied, "No, sir; not one third as much." And this result, the Transcript believes, will follow in any community where the officers entrusted with enforcement of the law do not wink at its violation; or worse, are in collusion with them, as is feared they are in this locality.—Windham County Transcript.

As a lawyer, Abraham Lincoln used to say that the best way to gain a just case was to free it from legal technicalities and get it "properly swung to the jury." In his "Life of Lincoln," Mr. Herndon tells a story to illustrate what his former law-partner meant by that peculiar phrase. A certain pension-agent had recovered for the widow of a revolutionary soldier the sum of four hundred dollars due and unpaid to her husband at his death, and had retained one-half of the amount for his fee. The claimant, a crippled old woman, hobbled into the office and told her story. It stirred Lincoln up, he brought suit against the agent, and on the day of the trial he said: "I am going to skin Wright, and get that money back." He did so. When the case came up, Lincoln put the white-haired claimant on the stand, and she told her story to the jury. When it was ended, Lincoln drew a picture of the hardships of Valley Forge, describing the soldiers as creeping barefooted over the ice, and marking their tracks with their bleeding feet. Then he contrasted the hardships endured for their country with the hardened action of the agent in fleecing the old woman of one-half of her pension. He was merciless; the members of the jury were in tears, and the agent writhed in his seat under the castigation of Lincoln's denunciation. The jury returned a verdict in favor for the full amount, and Lincoln made no charge for his services.

The bare trees of the forest
Their wretched garb resume,
The skies above are bluer,
And deeper lights illumine
The clefts upon the mountain side,
The ripples of the ocean tide.

Fashion.

There is very little that is new in shoulder capes of fur.

The newest driving cloak is of box cloth, in that particular shade of drab worn by the "whips" on the four-in-hand coaches. It is modelled on the Newmarket shape, and the bodice is ornamented on either side with a row of pearl buttons. For chilly weather there is a cape of the same material, which buttons on to the collar of the coat.

The most charming of wrappings are among the new importations, all of them picturesque and most of them becoming. For evening wear for the street or for any purpose one and all modes are elegant and distinguished. There is always an element of picturesqueness from the color which is dominant in every thing, outer garments as well as gowns and head gear. Half length garments are perhaps less becoming to short figures than to taller ones, but they are very stylish and quite the new mode for all.

For afternoon gowns the India silk is the chosen fabric, and a pretty way to add to the effect of the lace, since lace is de rigueur, is to have a frill of plain silk the color of the most prominent figure of the design placed under the lace ruffie, which gives a touch of color to the lace, brings out its woven pattern, and is a trifle out of the ordinary way of trimming.

Corduroy is made up in short suits for mountain-climbing, pedestrian excursions of all sorts, and for morning rambles over country roads and through forest tangles. These gowns will serve an excellent purpose this winter as rain dresses. The fine wools are in excellent variety. Their exquisite texture and coloring will make possible some of the ravishing costumes noted in many seasons.

Girdles have become very popular as well as elegant since they were introduced by the Cleopatra craze. They are of the medieva type, clasping at the front, encircling at the hips, and hanging far down on the skirt.

Browned Flour.

This is very useful to thicken gravy and give it a brown color. Put your flour into a pan, and set it over a moderate fire, stir it all the time till it is brown, but do not let it scorch as it will communicate an unpleasant taste to the gravy. When it is cool put it in a jar for future use.

BARNARD, SUMNER & Co.

Gentlemen, do you know it?
You pay a great deal of money for certain kinds of foreign made Undergarments.

To-day we'll match any English made Undershirt or Drawers with American made garments for about one-half the English price.

Take a Cartwright and Warner grade, splendid of course, but then we match the $4.00 quality with American at $2.00 to $2.50. Ladies!

Jersey vests and Drawers grow in favor, and for good reasons.

If you want to know about prices, the answer comes quickly.

It depends altogether upon what you want. We'll give a fair shirt for 25c.

For 50c you can have a right good one. For 75c an excellent one, good enough for any one, really, and fully as good as the $1.25 quality of last year.

You can have them with long sleeves or short sleeves.

When you strike the $1.00 $1.50 and $2.00 qualities, then you touch the excellencies.

For men we have a 50c Undershirt, heavy, soft French neck and ribbed bottom. A great shirt, with drawers to match, at same price.

No man would object to wearing this year's 75c shirt or drawers. They have long ribbed collars, and are fine.

Prices go up to $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50 and 4.00.

Total Annihilation.

"Oh! he was a flowery toothblack bold,
And his years they numbered nine;
Rough and unpolished was he, albeit
He constantly aimed to shine.

As passed on a king on his box he sat,
Munching an apple red,
While the boys of his set looked wistfully on,
And "Give us a bite!" they said.

But the toothblack smiled a forlornly smile
"No free bites here!" he cried,
Then the boys they sadly walked away,
Saw one who stood at his side.

"Bili, give us the core," he whispered low
That toothblack smiled a new merr,
And a noticeable dimple grew in his cheek,
"There ain't goin' to be no core!"

We carry an assortment of gloves that can not fail to meet any requirement in style, finish, size or shade of color.

Two or three new lines have been added to the stock this week, which we are pleased to mention, because of their decided value and low price.

As pretty a glove for $1.00 as ever shown by any body, is our new 8 button Mousquetaire Suede, in black, tans and slates.

It's equal has never before found its way to this city to be sold for less than $1.25. It will please you to be able to buy such a handsome glove for so little money. We recommend it.

Another new arrival is a 5 button Foster Lacing Glove of 79. It comes in all shades and black, and looks good enough to sell for a dollar. It would sell for that price in almost any store, but, as there is a slight difference between our regular dollar glove and this one, we make the price only 79c.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

Wellesley.

College opened September 9th, and contrary to custom, nature has favored us with delightful weather from the first day.
As usual every available place is filled, and in addition to special students, many regulars are boarding temporarily in the village, hoping that vacancies will occur.
President Shafer is back with us again, much improved in health.
Many changes have been made in the courses of instruction, especially in the required work of the first year. A course in English has been added, which is to be under the able direction of Miss Julia Hall of Worcester, who is the sister of President Hall of Clark University. The Billie work has been changed somewhat, and is to be directed by Miss Sara Emerson. It has been felt that in former years the best results have not been gained from the work in the gymnasium, because the classes have had to be held in the evening, consequently this year Freshmen will be required to attend three hours of class drill per week, and that during the daytime.
The gymnasium has been re-fitted for the change in the work, dressing rooms have been added, so that it is now as convenient as such small quarters can be. We are hoping that some one will soon see our need of a larger one, and make it possible for us to have it.
The Freshmen class numbers 194 this year. As usual, having had given way to as energetic endeavors to make them at home.
On the first Saturday evening the officers of the Christian Association received both old and new members of the college, in the center of the main building. During the reception the Freshmen were serenaded by the Sophomores.
Sunday, Sept. 13, was Flower Sunday. Dr. Parsons of Toronto, formerly of Boston, preached upon the text "God is love."
Monday Sept. 28, a reception was given by the class of '94 to that of '95. The reception was made a little less formal by giving it something of the character of a conversation party. During musical selections an opportunity was given for conversation, and at the end of each selection, a change of partners was in order.
Wednesday, Sept. 30, President Shafer received a telegram from Mrs. Harrison, that she might be expected at 5 in the afternoon. The week before she had called informally upon President Shafer, but this was to be a more formal visit. A half holiday was declared, and the college assembled in a body to do her honor. Upon entering the building she was greeted by the college cheer from the seniors, which was taken up successively by juniors and sophomores, freshmen and specials, who encircled the open center on the floors above. Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. McKee then received the Faculty and senior and junior classes in the Browning room.

The Freshmen had meanwhile formed themselves into a line on either side of the driveway and amid a great fluttering of handkerchiefs the party made its way to the Art Building, where an informal reception was held for about an hour and a half. Because of another engagement Mrs. Harrison was then obliged to leave, but she may be sure that all over the Union, wherever any of the present Wellesley girls may be, she will always have warm admirers.

Caulleria Rusticana.

It seems that the first presentation in this city and almost the first in the country of any part of this, at present much talked about composition was at one of Ben Hammond's recitals. December 20th, of last year, Mrs. Albert Curtis Marble sang in Colonial Hall, the stornello, "Fior di giaggiolo." Also, April 30th, of this year, Mr. Mortimer Howard sang at Mr. Hammond's studio, "Preludio e Sicilliana."

Worcester Academy.

"A city which is set on a hill cannot be hid." Beautiful for situation, on Providence hill stands the Academy, throwing the beams of intellectual light all about it. There are in the air intellectual, religious and physical influences making themselves felt all through the city.

The Academy opens this Fall with the largest attendance in its history, there being 185 as against 145 last year. The dormitories are full and it has been found necessary to hire the Wyman House opposite the grounds to accommodate all. This is in charge of Mr. White.

During the Summer, extensive improvements have been made. The dormitories have been newly painted and placed in the very best of order and changes have been made in the school-house which add to the beauty, comfort and usefulness of the building. The grading commenced a year ago has been completed, making an ample and admirably arranged campus for sports.

A new department has been arranged, known as the Polytechnic Preparatory course, to prepare for the Tech. It is in charge of Mr. Jesse Phillips who has been studying higher mathematics in Europe for the past year and a half.

A new instructor has been secured since the opening of the term, making nine in the faculty, an increase of three since a year ago.

Miss Everett, instructor in elocution at Wellesly, will be engaged to give instruction to the entire school in elocution.

Altogether, the growth of the school is great and healthy. The influences, while not at all denominational, are thoroughly religious and the young men are taught to feel that a true conception of life and a high ideal of manhood is the thing to be aimed at. No better school can be found for young men. Everything possible is done for them from the work in the finely equipped gymnasium to the religious exercises in the chapel.

Cornell.

ITHACA, N. Y., Sept. 13, 1891.

My Dear Mr. Roe:—

I send you herewith the itinerary of the Annual Inspection Tour for 1890, arranged by Prof. R. H. Thurston of Sibley College and open to all students in Cornell University. These trips have been taken for seven or eight years, and are now one of the fixtures of the Easter vacation. The trips are naturally of greatest interest to the technical students, but form a very pleasant vacation for any one interested in the great mechanical laboratories and workshops of the East. In 1887, one of the parties visited Worcester, and went through the W. P. I., Washburn & Moen's and, I think, Jerome Wheelock's. Usually from fifteen to twenty-five students, accompanied by from one to five of the faculty, follow the entire program for each section, but for the past two years over four hundred students have availed themselves of the opportunities offered and have spent a few days with the party.

Reduced rates on the railroads, and special rates at the hotels are secured and many places are visited, to which individuals could never obtain entrance. The excursions are in very high esteem by the faculty.

In other departments of the University, the system of excursions is highly developed, and classes in the School of Agriculture frequently spend several days in visits to fine farms. Classes in Social Science visit the jails, poor-houses and asylums of the state, the classes in pedagogy go to neighboring towns and cities, and each Spring, the entire classes of Junior and Senior civil engineers, are sent away for two weeks to put in practical work, and to study their subjects on entirely new ground. Cornell is enthusiastic over the excursion system, and believes it can teach a student many things obtainable in no other way.

Lehigh University at Bethlehem, Pa., has begun to follow Cornell's example. If you can use this letter or the program, I shall be glad to have you do so.

Yours sincerely,

LOUIE ERYLVE WARE.

Here follow no less than five sections, divided among Eastern, Western and Southern regions. Cornell seems to get along in spite of all excursions, but what a risk she runs!

MILLBURY.

One of the children of Mr. James Daniels was quite badly bitten by a dog Sunday afternoon. She had a piece of cake, which she was eating, when two dogs owned by Mr. Daniels came up. One of them tried to take the cake, the other tried to prevent him, taking the child's part. During the trouble the child was thrown down and as she fell she threw up her left hand which held the cake. The dogs, seeing it, snapped at it and bit her hand in four places. Dr. Booth, who happened to be near, dressed the wounds. The dog has been shot. At last accounts the child was doing well and will probably be all right in a short time.

The quiet of the Sabbath is disturbed by young men from Worcester riding through the town, shouting and blowing upon horns and in other ways creating a disturbance. It is bad enough to have to tolerate the sewerage without being forced to receive the skum of humanity.

What might have been a serious accident happened Sunday afternoon. Mr. Robert Molt, with his sister and brother, was driving on Elm Street and when near the watering trough, a team, coming in the opposite direction, shied at the water, flowing from the trough across the street, crashed into Mr. Molt's team, throwing him out and injuring him quite badly, so that he was insensible for a time. The horses cleared themselves, but were caught near the Tourtellotte House. Mr. Molt's sister and brother were badly frightened but not injured. The team causing the trouble was from a lively stable in Worcester and was driven by a man employed by Washburn & Moen as a driver. This escaped injury.

The home team defeated the Woonsocket 7 to 4 Saturday.

Rev. A. M. Crane preached his farewell sermon Sunday. He expects to start the last of the week for his new pastorate at Medfield.

At the regular meeting of Roland E. Bowen Camp, S. of V., Monday evening, four new recruits were mustered in. Action was taken in regard to attending the fair at Worcester. It is expected quite a delegation will go.

The ladies of the Unitarian Society held a fruit social Tuesday evening in Blanchard Hall. Supper was served from six to eight, after which dancing and a general good time was enjoyed.

Mr Lowell's Will.

Those parts of Mr. Lowell's will which relate to his library and manuscript are as follows:

I give to my friend Charles Eliot Norton a book from my library at his discretion.

I give to the corporation of Harvard College, for the library thereof, my copy of "Webster on Witchcraft," formerly belonging to Increase Mather, President of the College, and also any books from my library of which the College library does not already possess copies, or of which the topics or editions in my library are for any reason whatever preferable to those possessed by the College library.

I give my friend Charles Eliot Norton all my manuscript, correspondence, and papers, to dispose of the same at his discretion, hereby constituting him my literary executor.

The material which Mr. Lowell had collected for his biography of Hawthorne thus passes into Professor Norton's hand. The "Critic's" Boston correspondent doubts "if the author had progressed so far in the work as to leave even a fragment ready for the publisher. Had not pain afflicted him in his final years he would have made this work his pleasure."

The excessive pleasure we feel in talking of ourselves, ought to make us apprehensive that we afford little to our auditors.

Gentlemen:—Having purchased two of your Heaters, one now in use three years, the other 2 years, I can safely say we could hardly keep house without one. Look at this picture and read.

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a housekeeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility.

One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

HENRY W. MILLER, 156 MAIN STREET.

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1891.

No. 6

Human experience, like the stern-lights of a ship at sea, illumines only the path which we have passed over.
Coleridge.

Yet experience is of some utility in showing us how we may improve as we progress. All experience serves to direct the present and to provide for the future.

The vast array of reports with which the shelves of every law court are freighted are simply collections of experiences. Is it not possible for us to sail in the wake of those stern lights that Coleridge names and thereby have our own paths illuminated?

As yet, much of America's building is of an ephemeral character. We build today, our children or ourselves tear down tomorrow. How many of Worcester's structures could be standing one hundred years hence, yet few European cities cannot point the visitors to edifices that were standing before Columbus set forth on his voyage.

Possibly, when we look at the monstrous character of some of these buildings, we have reason to rejoice that they are not indestructible. When the architect took Gen. Sheridan over the newly finished Pension Office in Washington, the latter remarked that it had only one failing. Quite elated, the architect wanted to know what that fault was, but it is probable he was not so happy when the General said, "It's fire proof." That they are not fire proof is too often the best thing that can be said of certain pretentious edifices.

There have been very little system and rule in the building of our city. Our growth has not been the result of any system nor effort. Topsy like it has grown, till we have a population of more than 30,000, crowded into an area altogether too limited. Always conservative, it has been very difficult to break away from the thought, that all Worcester should live within a stone's throw of the Common.

Last week, LIGHT had an unusually lucid presentation of our street railway system, contrasting it with those in other cities of similar size. When cities, nearing our population were named, it was found that they had nearly twice our miles of railway. The reason for this is very evident. Covering wider areas, means of communication were necessary and street service of some sort followed. Some times it led and it is probable this will be the case in this city. Every new line of railway makes homes possible.

There is little doubt that ere many years, the electric road to Spencer will run through a continuous street of well built houses. Not unsightly structures, without form (and would that they were void) but pleasant home-like structures, such as may be found on the newly opened up North End region and in some parts of New Worcester. Similar lines of servive to Shrewsbury, Millbury, Tatnuck, and other outlying districts must produce similar results.

Were the homes of Worcester to cover all the territory included in our city limits, it would be just so much better for the people. In Worcester, there are 23,040 acres. Were our people spread over all this surface instead of being in so many crowded centres, what earthly paradises we might have? The time is far distant when any such crowding as that common in European cities will be necessary here. Rapid transit will do away with much of the unnatural way of living now prevalent.

Last week, LIGHT referred to the possible using of a part of the Common for City Hall purposes. That this proposed use is not liked by others is evident from the following note:

DEAR LIGHT:

Thanks for your word against using the Common as a site for a new City Hall or any other building. Hosts of citizens are of your way of thinking on this point.

ONE OF THEM.

ABOUT FOLKS.

Smith College Seniors recognize the merits of a former W. H. S. girl in making Miss Marion Drew class treasurer. She is a daughter of Mr. Charles C. Drew of the Directory.

Mr. Herbert F. Blood, who soon after his graduation from the High School took up the Insurance business and who for some years has been in the employ of Mr. A. C. Monroe, has accepted a position with the American Fire Insurance Company with headquarters at 156 Broadway, a section given up almost wholly to this line of work. His home will be in Brooklyn, the city to which so many New Yorkers retire when their work is done. Mr. Blood will be missed from a large circle of friends in Worcester.

Mr. Charles T. Tatman, late of the Polytechnic, has entered the Harvard Law School.

Mrs. T. K. Earle and daughter will spend the winter in Boston.

Mr. Alfred S. Roe gives his account of the Passion Play, in Millbury, next Thursday night.

Mrs. Annie Russell Marble contributed to the Golden Rule, the national Christian Endeavor Society weekly for October 1, an article on "The girl graduate at home."

The Chandler Street pupils did a nice thing Tuesday, in sending to their principal, Wm. H. Bartlett, a fine bouquet of flowers. Maggie Wilson and Ella Chamberlain made the presentation. They remember those in bonds as bound with them.

Miss Nettie J. Murray of this city is to be instructor of physical culture in the public schools, Nashville, Tenn. The West is to be congratulated.

Mrs. James G. Arnold of Harvard Street with Miss Alice G., and Mr. Charles H., her daughter and son, has just returned from a protracted visit to East Greenwich, R. I.

Miss Abbie Tisdale of West Dedham is visiting at No. 3 Dix Street.

Mrs. Anna (Phillips) Fay and husband of Hartford, Conn., are rejoicing in the birth of a girl baby, born in August. Mrs. Fay was graduated from our High School in 1885, a sister of Mrs. Joseph H. Perry of Highland Street.

Mr. T. J. Leland, who has held the position of janitor in the Burnside Building ever since its erection, resigns this week and will remove to his country residence at Woodstock, Conn. Hereafter he will spend the Winter season in Florida. Mr. Leland was foreman in the Washburn & Moen wire mill from 1861 to 1882, his practical knowledge and long connection with the business giving him an enviable reputation among wire manufacturers. In connection with several other gentlemen, he formed the Palmer Wire Company, and was the superintendent of the concern until his health failed, when he returned to this city and accepted the janitorship of the Burnside Building. Only last week Mr. Leland was offered a salary of $2,500 to accept a position as superintendent of a well known wire company, but thinks he has earned a rest by his long and arduous term of labor in this city. Mr. Leland will be greatly missed by a large host of friends, who wish him success in his new undertaking.

Miss Marshall.

The exhibition of her art work with which the friends of Miss Helen De Forest Marshall were recently favored is deserving of more than the passing notice which space last week allowed.

It embraced a large variety; portraiture, still life, landscape and flower studies being included, and water colors, oils and crayons represented. Where all was so good, it is hard to particularize as to merit; but a number of crayon life studies were especially noticeable as indicating the young lady's unusual talent as a portrait artist. Miss Marshall has been taking an extended course of study at the Cowles Art School, Boston, and has been awarded several prizes. Her work clearly shows that her training has been of the highest standard and that she is possessed of keen artistic feeling. She is to be complimented on having one of the finest collections we have ever seen in a private exhibit.

Miss Marshall is intending making art her profession and has already become favorably known as a teacher of painting. Her Summer vacation being past, she resumes teaching at her home No. 1 Congress Street.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, OCT. 10, 1891.

The Cornell Daily Sun, under the efficient editorship of Louie E. Ware, of Worcester, presents a very fine appearance. A daily college paper certainly marks a great advance in educational lines.

That misfortunes never come singly was well illustrated last week, when, in addition to exchanged names for the Library and Inn in Sterling, an interposed r changed "fiend" in Mrs. Hieman's excellent poem into "friend." Friends are to be preferred to fiends, as a rule, but in that particular place, the writer wished "To laugh all fiends to scorn."

LIGHT's readers will note the corrections and extend sympathy to all concerned.

Any one interested in LIGHT is urged to send in any personal item for the columns of this paper, all for the public's use. Visitors and visited, weddings, births and funerals, parties and entertainments will be most cordially greeted. Send them in.

School and College.

High School.

Through some misunderstanding on the part of some of the pupils, the class in book-keeping under Mr. Muzzy was unusually small on the opening day. It is to be hoped that more of the pupils will wake up to the advantages placed before them, to fit them for the duties of life. What more practical subject have we before us than this?

The Glee Club, which has come to be considered a leading feature of the school, opened its season very successfully last Monday afternoon. Through the efforts of Mr. W. L. Sprague and his associates on the new-members committee, eighty-six new members were admitted to the club, swelling the total membership to its limit, one hundred and twenty-five. No regular work was taken up but the hour was consumed with the singing of popular songs. Miss Mary Brandt officiated at the piano, in the absence of Miss Ruth Stone, the regular club pianist.

The appearance of the library has been improved by the addition of a new desk for the use of Miss Jillson.

Henry Dennis, John McKeon, and Clarence

Desmond, all of the class of '91, have successfully passed their examinations for admission to the Harvard Medical School, an honor both to themselves and the school which prepared them.

Mr. Wm. McAleer, of the class of '91, left Monday night for New York, where he is to study medicine. A party of his friends gave him a hearty send off at the station.

The Glee Club is very fortunate in that it has added to its membership Misses Alice Tucker, Ethel Curtis and Edith Sessions, all of the Class of '95, and all of whom have distinguished themselves in the musical line.

The foot ball eleven connected with the school is steadily increasing in strength and with a little more practice will be able to cope with the other elevens in the city. The W. H. S. eleven practices with the Dalzell eleven about twice a week and usually comes out victorious.

The clubs as usual held their meetings last Friday, a good attendance being marked in each case. The speaking was the finest, perhaps, in the assembly.

The Assembly's program included a reading, "Tent on the Beach" by G. W. Field; extemporaneous address on question, Resolved, that the city should incur the expense of building a new city hall, John Reid; paper, "A Visit to Niagara Falls," G. B. Knowles; reading, "Fable for Critics," W. W. Orr; question, Resolved, that the German race has done more for the world than the French race; affirmative, J. F. McGrail, E. W. Cutting, W. W. Orr; negative, H. L. Belisle, F. A. Stockwell; decided in negative; critic, E. A. Denny.

In the Euclia, the men were earnest in their debate and showed much spirit in their readings and declamations. The club is now on a high standing and will soon rival the other clubs in excellence of debate. The program follows: Declaration—Declaration of Irish Rights, John Curran; extemporaneous address on the question, Resolved, that the Democrats should be in power, F. C. Carrigan; readings by C. J. Hickey and C. E. Dowd; question: Resolved, that the Australian Ballot Law is conducive to the best interests of the country; affirmative—J. B. Murphy, J. J. Tierney, H. J. Murray; negative—P. J. McLaughlin, W. E. D. Stone, J. Curran. It was decided in the affirmative.

The Sumner Club's program: Reading, The Crusade, A. F. Parrot; declamation, Old Ironsides, G. A. Collie; extemporaneous address on the question, Are monopolies a benefit to the community, C. E. Andrews; reading, An American Deacon, H. F. Cutter; question, Resolved, that the morals of the United States are degenerating; affirmative, C. E. Andrews, W. L. Sprague, F. E. Gilbert; negative, E. W. Goodell, G. A. Collie, J. F. Munroe; decided in the negative.

The Altheia's program: Reading, Miss Bancroft; piano solo, Miss Taylor; dialogue, Misses Chapin, Gates, Hale and Harrington; comb duty, Misses Barnard; question, Resolved, that idleness is the cause of vice; affirmative, Misses Warner and Newton; negative, Misses Jackson and Perry; critic, Miss Foster.

The regular weekly rhetorical exercises were held in the hall Thursday morning.

They included the recitation of a poem on Dr. Holmes, "Filling an Order," J. T. Trowbridge, by Miss B. C. Bancroft; singing by the Weldon Male Quartet, which consists of Arthur H. Merriam, Geo. R. Bliss, Geo. F. Ellinwood and Walter S. Bliss, of Kuntze's "Evening Song" and the recitation by Miss Alice Gates of "The Deacon's Masterpiece."

Amherst.

To the names of the Worcester boys at Amherst should have been added that of Mr. E. Bryant, '95, who is pledged to the Chi Psi Fraternity.

The foot ball team is hard at work, and in spite of the amount of new material is already making a good showing. There are very few remarkable players, but whatever team work can do will be done by this year's eleven. The scores that have been made thus far against other teams are very satisfactory and promise well for the league games.

The total number of men in college this year is 335, of which the Junior class contributes ninety-two; the Seniors are second, and Freshmen third with eighty-four.

Senator Hoar was in town last week at the Woman Suffrage meeting, and spoke at chapel briefly the next morning. His remarks were especially upon the value of training in oratory.

Polytechnic.

The Tennis Association has elected the following officers:—President, L. C. Smith '92; vice-president, H. Sinclair '93; secretary and treasurer, G. M. Eaton, '94. It was voted to levy an assessment of twenty-five cents on each member, and settle up the small debts outstanding against the association. An executive committee consisting of L. C. Smith, '92, J. A. Derby, '93, and A. C. Higgins, '93, was elected, and ordered to investigate the matter of having four dirt courts laid out on the grounds.

The enthusiasm at the Institute over football, is something tremendous this year. Probably more than a hundred students attended the Tech-Academy game last Saturday. The athletic directors have voted to omit the regular Fall field day; the Tennis Association has practically given up the idea of a tournament this season, and all available money and push is being put behind the pigskin to keep it rolling in a manner creditable to the school.

The Institute eleven is practicing every night on Dewey's field, and real solid practice too. Some evenings, there are as many as fifteen or twenty candidates for the second eleven thing heretofore almost unheard of. Everyone is learning foot-ball. Games are being arranged with Amherst, M. I. T., Brown Varsity, Amherst Agricultural, and other colleges. One game has already been decided upon. The Institute eleven will play the Harvard second eleven at Cambridge, October 31. The attempt to secure Lake as coach, failed, for the famous ex-Tech player, could not get away. Wednesday, W. D. Berry, of this city went to Conn., to engage Stagg, if possible to take his place.

The Faculty has appointed as an athletic committee to meet the students, Profs. Alden, Kinnicut, and Conant, and Messrs. Coombs and Beals, and it is hoped that the rule limiting the out of town games to two, will be modified, and that more encouragement will be given the students than has been in the past.

The members of the Y. M. C. A., deserve the thanks of the Institute for putting through so successfully their reception. It was perhaps the first real social event of any importance ever indulged in on Tech hill and was thoroughly enjoyed by all. There was singing by a selected quartet; music by a banjo and guitar trio; violin and whistling solos, for entertainment. Light refreshments were served during the evening. A large number of young ladies were present to animate and grace the scene, and the sombre brick walls of the Laboratory, and even the pebbly roof, listened for the first time to youthful tete-a-tetes. The reception was ostensibly given by the Y. M. C. A., to members of the Junior class, but as there was only about twenty-five students in the Institute not included in one of these two organizations, everyone was invited.

The Camera Club has elected E. H. Keith '94, President; A. C. Higgins '93, vice-president, and E. W. Vail '93, secretary.

A shower-bath has been placed in the basement of Boynton Hall for the use of the football players.

Cornell.

At this institution, there are no less than twenty-five distinct courses. One of the latest departments opened is that in philosophy, said to be the broadest in America. The Philosophical Review will be published by this department. The Course in Pedagogy is especially popular. Prof. Moses Cook Tyler is lecturing on the history of religion, a new department in Collegeville. Prof. Herbert Tuttle has given his opening lecture on Modern European History.

Dudley Academy.

The hill in Dudley had a celebration, Tuesday, Sept. 29th. It is well known that Mr. Conant of Pawtucket has repeatedly been the benefactor of the town and academy, one of his latest gifts being a new church edifice to take the place of the one burned a few years ago. Mindful of his generosity, certain Pawtucket friends, under the lead of Mr. Parks raised $500.00 to buy a 2200 pound bell which was presented on this date as a mark of appreciation of Mr. Conant's worth.

Ex-Governor Littlefield of Rhode Island was master of ceremonies, representing the forty or more joint givers.

Rev. John Williams of Kansas, an old Dudley boy, offered prayer and the Rev. Mr. Richards, pastor of the church, with the Rev. Mr. McGreggor of Pawtucket joined in the exercises. Mr. Parks made the formal presentation and Mr. Richards accepted. Dinner was served at the Conant mansion. Meanwhile the bell had been elevated to its place and at 2 P. M., a general bell ringing took place in which all donors took a hand. Then all repaired to the Academy Hall where the exercises were continued in the way of a memorial of the old bell lost in the fire. Miss Ada L. Leland, for three years a pupil in the Worcester High School, but now a pupil in the Academy recited with telling effect Poe's Bells. She was the recipient of many compliments on account of her success. Afterwards Ex-Governor Littlefield, Olney Arnold and Mr. Conant spoke. Thanks were voted to Mr. Parks and all who had taken part in this Rhode Island tribute to Massachusetts.

Holy Cross.

John H. Kelley of Fairfield, Conn., formerly of the class of '92, has been visiting his classmates at the college the past few days. He will sail for Rome on the 24th. He was presented last Thursday by his classmates with a handsome gold cross, similar in design to the class medal. Mr. Kelley was a prominent member of the college, being centrefielder on the ball team, and one of the best singers in the Glee Club and one of the leaders of his class. The best wishes of his classmates and college friends will go with him.

Rev. E. J. Welch, S. J., preached at St. Paul's church last Sunday.

The field sports will be held sometime during the coming week. Mr. John H. O'Connor, '92, has been elected chief-marshal for the day.

James F. Timon, W. H. S. '88, H. C. C. '91 and T. H. Sullivan of Millbury, H. C. C. '91 have entered the law department of Boston University.

The ball game scheduled with Woonsocket for last Thursday was cancelled on account of bad weather.

The teachers and pupils of the School of English Speech had a very enjoyable gathering at their rooms in Colonial Hall, Wednesday evening. The school began its year's work Thursday, October 8. The rooms are very finely arranged for the several departments of instruction. The large hall fitted up for reading and dramatic study has a large stage, curtains, etc., and will seat over two hundred.

There will be classes in Shakespeare, history, and literature, voice culture, reading, pronunciation, gesture, fencing, etc. The courses of study are adapted to meet the wants of students, from those who are still pursuing a general education elsewhere, to the professional student, the amateur of literature, the searcher for physical and intellectual refreshments; in fact for all those who wish to keep abreast of the time in speech and bearing.

Special mention is made of a new class being formed for the study of the dictionary, particular attention being given to accurate pronunciation of words, their elements, combinations, accents, and at the competitive examination in June, prizes will be awarded. The first prize will be the Century Dictionary, the second a gold medal. This class will probably be largely attended by students from different schools, but also it is hoped many others will avail themselves of the opportunities offered at such terms as to be in the reach of hundreds of our young people. The second class of fifty will be formed as soon as the first begins work, but all will have the same course and all compete together. All desiring evening hours will have places given them.

Church Choirs.

E. N. Anderson and Henry Dike Sleeper, of this city, are on this year's board of teachers of the school for church musicians at Hartford, Conn. Mr. Anderson will teach vocal culture and interpretation, and Mr. Sleeper, sight reading, harmony and counter point.

The Salem-street Church Choral Society met last week to lay out plans for the coming season. Officers were chosen, B. D. Allen being re-elected director. Rehearsals will be held till the fortnightly rehearsals begin. The society will shortly take up Schuman's "Pilgrimage of the Rose."

The Epworth League took charge of the meetings in the Leicester church last Sunday. Fourteen went out, Misses Alice E. Bates, Annie Bates, Emily Bates, Carrie Clark, May Foster, Nellie Layng, Gertrude L. March, Flora Minor, Lucy Richardson, Mrs. Nellie Moulton, Messrs. A. L. Farwell, C. S. Forbes, F. J. Metcalf and D. R. Taber.

The regular monthly preachers' meeting will be held next Monday. Program: Symposium, How to conduct a prayer-meeting, opened by Rev. Geo. S. Butters; Sketches of Sermons, Rev. F. A. Liverett, Rev. Garrett Beckman; Law of Festivals, Rev. T. Curwick; The Lalty in Church Work, Rev. N. Fellows.

Thirty pieces of HARTFORD, LOWELL, WHITTALL'S, PHILADELPHIA Brussels Carpets, standard prime five frame quality, 89 cents a yard, this morning; continuing until sold; which won't be long we know:

In extending this remarkable offer the object of the new manager and buyer of carpets is to sell off at once, carpets bought previous to the change in management, which began with this season.

The price is strangely low, even for the poorest Brussels carpets made, and when extended to the standard makes--Lowell, Bigelow and Whittall, it is indeed remarkable.

The qualities are all that can be desired; and the patterns are in colors from very light to dark; the darker carpets are well suited to the hall, library, dining-room, or private office.

The reduction is from $1.15 and $1.25. Six of the thirty pieces are in the window.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY.

Three New Pastors.

The Congregational churches of this city are called upon to welcome, this month, three new pastors to their already large ranks of workers. Rev. Inman L. Willcox becomes the pastor of Park Church; Rev. E. W. Phillips begins his first pastorate, at Hope Church at South Worcester and Rev. Laurence Perry commences his first pastorate, at Lake View Church. The latter two will be ordained at their installation services.

As all three are still young, both in years and in the work, there is no long story to tell. LIGHT simply introduces them to its readers, telling of the preparation they have had for the work upon which they now enter.

Rev. Inman L. Willcox.

Last January, when Rev. E. G. Fullerton ceased to be pastor of Park Congregational Church, the church began to look about for some one to fill its vacant pulpit. In February, Rev. Inman L. Willcox, the pastor of the Shrewsbury Congregational Church was invited to occupy the Park Church pulpit for one Sunday. The congregation was so favorably impressed with his sermon and with his manner that he was invited to preach again in June. Very soon afterwards a call was extended to him by the church to become its pastor. He accepted the call and began his work early in August. The installation services were held at the church Tuesday evening.

Rev. Inman L. Willcox was born in Oxford, New York, in 1859. His ancestors were of English descent and were among the pioneers of New England. His grandparents removed to central New York, settling in what was then almost a wilderness. His parents were farmers and consequently in his youth he followed the same calling. He attended each year the two terms of the district school.

When he was nineteen years old he entered Oxford Academy. He completed the full four years preparatory course, graduating in 1882. In the Fall of the same year he entered Hamilton College, from which he was graduated in 1886. He then entered Andover Theological Seminary, completing his three years course here in 1889.

From the beginning, Mr. Willcox's object in securing his education was that he might become a Congregational minister. The influences surrounding his home life did not bring him to this decision as his parents were Universalists, but he attended the Congregational church in his native town and there received his first impressions of that faith which he afterwards adopted as his own. His studies and experiences later strengthened his belief in the Congregational doctrines.

He preached his first sermon while in college, in a church in a neighboring town. During the summer preceding his entrance to the seminary he preached several times in the Congregational Church of Sydney, New York, and was invited to become its acting pastor. He preferred, however, to complete his education. After the first term, throughout the entire seminary course he preached nearly every Sunday, in this way earning sufficient money to pay his entire seminary expenses. One year he supplied a pulpit in New Hampshire and another year he filled the pulpit of the Congregational Church in West Hartford, Vermont.

Very soon after graduating from Andover, he received an invitation from the Shrewsbury Congregational Church, then without a pastor, to preach there as a candidate. The church was so well pleased with him that he was at once given a call to become its pastor. He had already received another call from the church in Sydney, New York, but he accepted the one from Shrewsbury. The ordination and installation took place October 18, 1889.

At the beginning of his pastorate, interest in the church was at a low point as there had been no pastor for nine months. The Christian Endeavor Society existed almost in name only. But with the coming of Mr. Willcox the interest revived. The congregations increased in numbers and the church membership grew. The Christian Endeavor Society was reorganized and is now in a very flourishing condition. The contributions for benevolence increased, doubling in last year alone. Also last year, the church was remodeled and has now one of the most beautiful interiors of all the country churches within many miles of Worcester. And last, but by no means least, during the two years pastorate, the church membership was increased by eighteen new members.

In June, came the call from the Park Church. The Shrewsbury people did not wish to lose their pastor and sent him a letter begging him very earnestly to remain with them. But it seemed best to Mr. Willcox to accept the call to Worcester and he notified Park Church to that effect in an informal letter, June 22, and with a formal acceptance early in July. He came to Worcester August 1st.

Mr. Willcox married, in 1885, during the last year of his college course, Miss Myra Tower of Oxford, New York. One child, a girl now nearly three years old, has come to brighten the household. Mr. Willcox resides at 72 West street.

Rev. E. W. Phillips.

Rev. Mr. Phillips is the first settled pastor of Hope Church. This church was started originally by the Congregational City Missionary Society as a mission. Later it became one of the members of the Church of the Covenant, over which Rev. Albert Bryant, then superintendent of the City Missionary Society, presided as pastor. The Houghton Street Church and the Lake View Church were the other members. In 1889, when Mr. Bryant resigned as superintendent of the City Missionary Society to become pastor of the Belmont Church the three members of the Church of the Covenant separated and each became an individual self-supporting church, the Houghton Street Church retaining the name of the Church of the Covenant. Hope Church has never had a settled pastor but has hired young students as workers. Mr. Joseph Walther, who is now studying at Brown University worked here for the longest period. However, after the 19th of this month, Hope Church will have a regular installed pastor of its own.

Rev. E. W. Phillips was born in Nelson,

New Hampshire, August 5, 1861. When he was four years old his parents removed to Harrisville in the same state and when he was twelve they again moved, this time to Marlboro, New Hampshire. During this time he attended the public schools and worked in a factory during vacations. At the age of sixteen, he first experienced religion.

He entered Kimble Union Academy at Meriden, New Hampshire when he was seventeen. He completed the regular three years course and then continued his studies another year to prepare for college, having decided to study for the ministry. He graduated from the academy, valedictorian of his class.

He entered Williams College in 1884 and was graduated therefrom in 1888. At the final elections of this class he was chosen secretary, a permanent office. In the Fall succeeding his graduation from college he entered Hartford Theological Seminary. During the first year he was elected the Seminary book agent, on account of his recognized business ability. Also he soon became interested in the work among the city missions. During the first Summer vacation he was pastor's assistant in the Fourth Church of Hartford, of which Prof. Graham Taylor is pastor. He did mission and open air work. At various times he also worked for the Connecticut Bible Society on the religious canvass of Hartford.

At the opening of the second seminary year he became the pastoral assistant of Warburton Chapel Mission, which position he held through the year.

When the second Summer came, he decided to spend his vacation resting at home. But when he reached there he found a small country parish without a pastor and accepted an invitation to supply its pulpit for the entire Summer. Success crowned his labors. Among other good works he accomplished, he was instrumental in organizing several Christian Endeavor Societies in that and neighboring towns.

In the fall of 1890 he returned to the seminary to begin his last year. In December he received an invitation from Hope Church of this city to preach here as a candidate for pastor. He did so and very soon a call was sent by the church inviting him to supply the pulpit Sundays until he should complete his seminary course. Mr. Phillips accepted the call. He preached every Sunday, coming from Hartford every week for that purpose. In the spring of 1891, he was invited to become, September 1, the permanent pastor at a salary of $1100. He accepted the invitation and began his work as regular pastor in September. The ordination and installation will take place at Hope Church, corner of South-bridge and Princeton streets Monday, October 19.

Mr. Phillips married, this week Wednesday, Miss Chamberlain of Sharon, Vermont, a graduate of Oberlin College. His home is at 12 Princeton street.

Rev. Laurence Perry,

the pastor-elect of Lake View Church is a native of Maine, having been born in Portland, in June, 1861. His parents were merchants in comfortable circumstances, as had been his ancestors for several generations. When he was fifteen years of age the family moved to Newton, Mass., where he entered the High School. He did not complete the course there but, at the age of eighteen, he entered business in Portland. Later he removed to Boston, engaging in business there also.

In the Spring of 1887, he decided to study for the ministry. His early instructions led him to adopt the Congregational faith and he began his studies in the Fall with a course of languages with Prof. Haley at Lowell. The following Spring he spent one term in study at Boston University and in the Fall of 1888 he entered the theological school connected with the University. Two years were spent here and then he went to the Hartford Theological Seminary to complete his education, graduating therefrom last May.

In March of this year, Rev. Mr. Latham, who was then acting as pastor for the Lake View Church, invited Mr. Perry to supply his pulpit one Sunday when he was unable to occupy it himself. In May, when the church had no leader, it invited Mr. Perry to preach again, which he did with the result that he was at once given a call to become its first settled pastor. The call was accepted and Mr. Perry began the work in June. The date of the ordination and installation has not yet been decided upon.

Mr. Perry is unmarried and boards, at present, on the Boulevard, at Lake View.

An Old Letter.

CHANTILLY, 20th APRIL, 1778.

MY DEAR SIR,

Tomorrow morning I shall set out for Congress, having been detained five weeks from thence by the illness and death of my much loved brother of Bellevue. He has expressed a desire to have his eldest Son placed under the immediate and sole care of the reverend Mr. Maddison of the College for the purpose of finishing his education. My brother had a high opinion of, and an affectionate regard for Mr. Maddison, but my acquaintance with that worthy gentleman is not sufficient to warrant my application to him on this subject. By means of your friendship therefore, I would wish to interpose Sir with Mr. Maddison to receive my Nephew and conduct his education. If it can be done, we want to have Master Lee boarded in College, but be confined altogether to Mr. Maddison's tuition. Will you be pleased to consult Mr. Maddison on the subject, and inform Mrs. Lee of Bellevue by letter directed for her by Post to the care of James Hunter, esqr., near Fredericksburg, whether this can be done, and what the College expence together with Mr. Maddison's private charge will amount to. No time will be lost in sending the young gentleman down, when Mrs. Lee shall know that he can be received as it is proposed above. I hope your goodness will excuse this trouble since it arises from the desire of our deceased friend, from my necessary absence and from the small acquaintance that I have with Mr. Maddison.

I have heard with much astonishment that some people in Newkent and others in Gloucester have proposed to stipulate with their Delegates that they shall not vote for my continuance in Congress because I made a motion there that General Washington should be removed from the command of the American Army! If this had been proposed because I had the last week murdered the Emperor of China, it would be just as well founded, and as well founded in truth. But Sir, all the arts and tricks of Tories, and their Abettors, shall not prevail with me to desert the public councils during the present storm, unless it shall be determined so by those who have a right to do it; and then, I shall without a murmur retire from distress and pain to ease and happiness. As the Independent representative of an Independent people, I have a right to move what my judgment directs me to think is for the public good. If I have erred, I am answerable for my mistakes no doubt, but then my reasons should be heard before condemnation takes place. Thus much upon a supposition that I had made the motion supposed, but when the charge itself is a groundless and malicious lie, what must be thought of the Propagators of it, or of those who suffer themselves to be so far deluded as to censure an innocent man without evidence or hearing.

All this personal and malignant persecution of the Tories does not affect me near so much as the abominable manner in which I am told, that those who are intrusted, conduct the transportation of Pork to the Army. I am very wrongly informed if this most necessary article does not lie at many Stages with hoops loose, some off, some heads out, and the Pork spoiling having lost its pickle. That between Fredericksburg and Caves ware house, only 8 miles, the waggons make two days travel, when paid at an enormous daily hire! To prevent a total loss of the pork, to expedite the business, prevent fraud, and to save us from the heavy expence of transporting useless Meat, should not proper Inspectors and Coopers be employed at each Stage to separate the Sound from the unsound pork, and to apply fresh pickle and Coopersage. And surely a Waggon Master, ought forever to attend every brigade of waggons to compel the accomplishment of proper days journeys when the Waggons are hired by the day more especially, and to prevent any abuse of the public provisions. I assure you my dear friend there is no time to be lost in rectifying this important matter. Colo. Jett informed me as I lately passed thro King George County, that the former and the latter drafts, amounting to 42 men were yet in the county no Officer ever having been appointed to call for them. There are in our jail of this County two Deserters from the Army who may be ordered under the same Officer with the K. George Draft to camp. Colo. Jett further said that a certain Thos. Hungerford of the Contl. Army was in the County of K. George & who would readily carry these men off if ordered to do so. Every principle of policy and safety calls for an immediate reinforcing of the Army, I pray you then Sir to contrive it, so that an Officer may immediately be ordered to take these two deserters from hence, & the Drafts from King George County. I hope to write you in a few days from Congress, until when I remain as usual, most affectionately yours.

RICHARD HENRY LEE.

Autumn.

Now comes the artist Autumn, and with lavish hand
Puts on his colors over every wood and tree,
Reds, golds and yellows are at his command,
And browns and olives blend harmoniously.

When every cast-off leaf becomes a treasure,
Of glowing pigment, marvelously planned,
And scarlet oak and maple tree doth measure
The gamut of all color from his hand.

Then let our eyes feast on this rare display,
And thro' the wood and meadow let us roam,
Perhaps as through some field we take our way,
(Our eyes may chance upon a gentian bloom.

Soon o'er this needle carpet that we tread,
Ere many changes of the moon be told,
A whiter one, all smoothly will be spread,
To keep, from all beneath, the Winter's cold.
M. M. H.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. Little and Miss Grace Little, 15 King street, have gone to Boston for the winter. They will be at home to their friends at No. 3 Joy street.

Mr. R. J. McKay, of the Denholm McKay Company will soon remove, with his family to No. 15 King street.

PLAYS AND PLAYERS.

Mrs. Langtry suffers from a severe chronic catarrh.

During 1892, Alexander Salvini will make a tour of the world with a French supporting company. The American dates will be played in New Orleans.

A well known stock actor during the first performance of a piece forgot a long and important speech at a time when the prompter wasn't on deck. He hesitated a moment and then led the heroine into a cabin. In ten minutes they emerged before the impatient audience, and Mr.—said, "Now darling, you know the story of my life." It was out of sight.

Bill Nye says his play, the Cadi, reminds him of some of the weaker passages in Shakespeare.

Marie Wainwright is said to be a perfect dream of daintiness, grace and beauty in her new play, Amy Robsart.

"Max Elliot," or rather Mrs. Granville Alden Ellis, whose dramatic and other intellectual writings appear frequently in the Boston Herald, recently re-married her divorced husband. She is evidently striving for a reputation for eccentricity.

Very few people are aware that Otis Skinner, leading man and manager for Margaret Mather is a son of Rev. Charles Skinner of Somerville. Otis made his debut as John the Piper's Son at a Sunday School entertainment, twenty years ago.

Milton Aborn, the opera comedian, has done the best work of his life this season. Several times people in the audience have been seen to smile.

The souvenir presentation fad was topped recently by the management of Palmer's theatre New York, who gave each of the audience at the hundredth performance of the "Tar and the Tartar," a solid silver souvenir spoon.

Edgar L. Davenport of the Boston Museum, was quietly married last week to Louis Davis a popular young lady of that city. Miriam O'Leary, of the same company is reported engaged to a young Boston physician.

About Folks.

The classes in English Literature, taught by Mrs. Annie Russell Marble began last Monday in the rooms of Mrs. Morgan in Y. M. C. A. Building. The classes meet once a week.

At the meeting of the Reform Club last Sunday night, Major F. G. Stiles recited with telling effect, Col. John Hay's "The Advance Guard."

Col. Ivers Phillips of Boulder, Colorado, is visiting friends in this city. He seems hale and hearty in spite of his more than eighty-six years.

The many friends of Mr. Salem Copeland of Wachusett Street are regarding his serious illness with much anxiety. He is attended by Dr. r. Wörner and Ellis.

Rev. George S. Pelton of Higganum, Conn., who was the first pastor of Park Church, has been spending this week in Worcester, staying at the residence of Mr. C. W. Bowker, 114 Elm Street.

Mrs. Elizabeth L. Gird starts Monday for Utica, N. Y., where she will visit friends.

A Wisconsin judge lately refused to naturalize a German who had lived in this country twenty-five years, amassing a fortune of a quarter of a million dollars. He wished to go back to his native country protected from German demands by his American papers, just as all these years he had claimed to be a German, thus excusing himself from American obligations. All hail to such a judge! Would there were more like him.

Mr. Wm. S. Smith, till recently of Smith & Adams, has bought out the hardware business of Neale & Goulding, nearly opposite his old stand. Mr. Smith has had an almost life long experience in this line of business, having passed twenty years with the late Henry W. Miller and five years in company with Mr. Elwood Adams. In his new place he will carry a general assortment of hardware goods. Mr. Neale, who will remain in his employ, was also one of Mr. Miller's boys.

James H. Churchill, son of James K. Churchill, Senior Vice Commander of the G. A. R., and himself a Worcester High School and Technical boy has taken rooms in the new Exchange Buildings on State Street, Boston, and announces himself as a patent solicitor. His native vim and energy will surely carry him well to the front.

The lecture of Mr. Joseph Cook, on the 26th inst., for the benefit of Hope Church must not be forgotten. He repeats his famous talk on "The Seven Modern Wonders" in Association Hall, as above.

Conant Mansion.

In connection with LIGHT's account of the Natural History Society in last week's paper it might have been stated that the new house of the society was erected by George Hobbs, the first 1st Lieutenant of the City Guards and afterwards Brigadier General of Militia. It was long his home.

Amos A. Parker.

This aged gentleman of Fitzwilliam, N. H., and LIGHT's frequent contributor, passed his 100th birthday last Thursday, the 8th, inst. Few people reach such a point in life's journey. Next week there will be something about the event in these columns.

A New Music Book.

Mr. C. P. Morrison, organist at the Main Street Baptist Church and for many years one of the most prominent musicians in Worcester, is the author of a Method for the Piano-forte, whose first part is just issued by the White-Smith Music Publishing Company of Boston. In the first part, for sale by S. R. Leland & Son, are 128 pages of matter which Worcester music lovers, especially, will be glad to see. It must prove a great success.

Cadet School.

It now appears that the Republican candidate for governor, Hon. Charles H. Allen, was once a cadet at our Highland School. He was a member of the class of 1864 along with Mr. Frank A. Leland. With one year intervening he went thence to Amherst College.

Mrs. Luther K. Leland.

Mrs. Mary E. Leland, who died Saturday, Oct. 3d at No. 9 Dix Street, had been an invalid for many years. Her former home was North Grafton where her funeral was attended, Tuesday, at the residence of Mr. Wm. T. Barker. There were prayers at her late residence, at 1 o'clock.

Fashions.

The Scottish Syndicate has made a great strike in issuing a paper with the above title. They have put out 200,000 copies, dividing the same among the cities represented in the corporation. The Denholm & McKay Company is the Worcester representative. It is shaped very much like Harper's Bazaar and it certainly makes a remarkably good appearance. There are sixteen pages, with full page illustration, stories by Bret Harte, Harriet Prescott Spofford and others. All cuts were made expressly for this paper. The fashion plates are many and excellent. Music, Art, and Old World Gossip are given. In a word, the paper seems to have reached at its first step a position usually attained only after years of trial and labor.

Caleb A. Wall.

The talk of Mr. Wall in Tatnuck was well attended last Saturday, all expressing much satisfaction at the words of the Antiquary. This was the ninth meeting that Mr. Wall has conducted as will be seen from the following list: Lake Park, June 15, 1889; Packachoag Hill, July 13, 1889; North Worcester, Dec. 6, 1889; Pilgrim Hill, (South End) April 1890; Burncoat Plain, (N. E. Worcester) May 24, 1890; Coal Mine Farm, (Plantation Street) June 14, 1890; James Draper's (Bloomingdale) Aug. 19, 1890; Sagatabscott Hill, Feb. 1891; Tatnuck, Oct. 3, 1891.

Parker Genealogy.

Mr. Theodore Parker, of this city, has in press a genealogy of the Parker Family, a work upon which he has been laboring for four years. It will be a book of 400 pages and will be worth much to the student of this interesting subject. The name, including so many noted people will make the book of special value. It is promised before the close of the present year. Charles Hamilton & Co., are doing the printing.

Fay-Davis.

The marriage of Mr. Frank Slater Fay to Miss Alice Julie Davis, Tuesday, was one of the pleasant social events of the season. They were married at 3 Bellevue Street, where their home is to be. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Geo. S. Ball of Upton who did a like service for Mr. Fay's parents. George Butler was best man and Miss Leighton of Clinton, bridesmaid. The ushers were Messrs. Walter Wesson, Booker, Francis and Flint. Rebboli served a supper at 6 p.m. Numerous gifts were received and later the young people started on a wedding trip to New York. Mr. Fay was once a High School boy and is now a book-keeper with James Legg & Co. His new venture has LIGHT's best wishes.

"FRIDAY POPULARS."

Notes About Town.

Dr. Louis E. Lamson, who for the past three years has been second bass at Piedmont Church, has received a call to fill the same position in the Congregational Church, Millbury.

Mr. George A. Clark, with George H. Clark & Co., leaves shortly for a protracted trip, in the hope that he may regain his former health. His associates will wish him success.

Mr. Z. Frank Little, who for the past year has conducted the New York Dry Goods House, has removed to Portland, Me., where he is to engage in the wholesale and retail dry goods business with his brother X. John and A. Little. The brothers have been in the business for the past fifteen years and success in their new venture is assured. The house will be the largest outside of Boston, in New England. Mr. Little's many friends here unite in wishing him many prosperous years to come.

My Marriages.

The lecture by the Rev. Mr. Worth at Grace Church last Thursday evening on the above subject was well received. The proceeds were devoted to the Church Aid Society.

James Russell Lowell.

(Loeace's Ode, I., 24)

God gave thee power to make such music as should soothe

Our wounded hearts, Melpomene;

Sing to us now, fret, oh! I mourn, without regret or shame,

One most beloved.

Eternal sleep clasps our Quinctillus, whose like nor

Honor, Truth,

Justice, nor Loyalty shall see again!

By good men wept, he died! Virgil, our friend is gone!

Yet all thy tears are vain—

Thou canst not call him back; may, had thy lute

A sultan's magic than the Thracian's harp

It could not summon from that Yonder Shore

The phantom that has crossed thither.

Hard—hard is this!

And yet sweet Faith lightens the burden of the cross

We likewise could not bear.

—Eugene Field.

Books and Bookmen.

The Artist Printer for September, A. C. Cameron & Co. Chicago and St. Louis, $1 per year.

This periodical grows in size and interest. The table of contents reveals a deal of matter pertaining to the master printer's good. The evils of competitive bidding are shown. Printing for the blind will interest those who wish to know how this is done. Volapuk is continued. The correspondence from all parts of the country is specially valuable. Every printer should read "The Artist Printer."

Prof. McMaster promises the third volume of his history of the United States this Fall.

The Publishing House of Lee & Shepard has long been an institution of Boston, but Mr. Lee has been the firm for some years, for Mr. Shepard passed away several years ago.

William Morris, the English poet, artist and socialist, affects a singularly shabby and unpicturesque attire. He may be seen on Oxford street, in London, wearing an old slouch black hat and an ancient sack-coat, baggy trousers and a blue flannel shirt. The necktie is usually missing and sometimes he wears no collar. But his flowing white hair and beard make him an object of interest to every passer-by.

Mrs. Gladstone has contracted to write a series of articles for The Ladies' Home Journal, of Philadelphia, especially intended for American women. The series will be called "Hints from a Mother's Life," and in it the great English statesman's wife will tell the method which she adopted in bringing up her children. As Mrs. Gladstone is one of the most practical women in England, and her children have all attained positions of eminence, her articles for the Journal will have a peculiar interest to every mother in the land.

One of the most important articles of the month is an article on James Russell Lowell by Edward Everett Hale in the October number of the New England Magazine. Dr. Hale is well known to all the world as a brilliant essayist, and the close intimacy which existed between him and the poet gives a personal interest to his article, which adds to its attractiveness. A number of anecdotes of Lowell are incorporated in the body of reminiscences and criticism, and, receiving publicity now for the first time, give the article a piquancy which it could not otherwise possess. A fine portrait of Lowell in his study, taken just before his death, forms the frontispiece of the magazine.

Mrs. Mary Hallock Foote, who first came before the public as an illustrator, and later as the author of "The Led-Horse Chain" and other novels of Western life, has written a new story which will be one of the serial features of The Century. Mrs. Foote has chosen a field unbacked in fiction, the irrigation schemes of the Great West. "The Chosen Valley" will be illustrated by the author.

The poet Shelley could never see a body of water without lingering to sail paper boats.

Twisting up any bit of paper into small likeness of a boat, he would launch it carefully and watch it with solicitude until it floated out of sight or sank. He would even consign valued letters to the waves when other materials gave out. One day, having exhausted his supplies in the round pond in Kensington Gardens, he found himself destitute of paper beside the Serpentine, which afforded noble opportunities for navigation. His pocket contained nothing but a $\frac{1}{2}$ note. He hesitated long but finally yielded. Twisting the bill with unusual care, he set it afloat. At first the tiny craft spun helplessly in the current, but finally getting its bearings, struck out boldly for the opposite shore. The reckless poet, hastening across the river, awaited it with grave solicitude, and after much maneuvering ran it ashore. Removing it from the dangerous element he spread it carefully in the sun to dry, his face beaming the while with proud satisfaction.—Exchange.

The New England Magazine would be expected to give something about Lowell, nor does it disappoint us. He is shown first in his study at Elmwood, that ideal study, with outlook upon Mount Auburn where so much that he loved was buried. In fancy we can look through the partition to the second part of that study and see the many treasures that the poet had hoarded there. Mr. Hale's article is all that we could wish from the hand of the writer and friend. The history of "The Pioneer" that early venture of Mr. Lowell's, accompanied by pictures is in quite a new line but it is a charming bit of retrospect. Mr. Nourse's "Public Libraries" is much of a compend of Mr. Tillinghast's Report to the State Board of Education, but it should have an extensive circulation. "Newburyport" by Ethel Barton, (Is she a relative of James?) is an excellent showing of that quaint old town by the sea. Possibly General Butler's reminiscences will be read as readily as anything in the October number, for whatever the public may think of the General, few have ever deemed him dull. Like the most of New Englanders, he has a famous lineage and his boyhood was precocious. Dr. Mayo sets forth "The Woman's Movement in the South" and S. Francis Harrison tells over again "The Siege of Louisberg."

Table Talk. Table Talk Publishing Co., Philadelphia, Penn.

Half the magazine is given up to the department of Housekeeper's inquiries. Among them may be found menus for weddings, and little lunches, with small dinners, all with full directions how to prepare the different articles which are on the list. One lady asks for a list of kitchen utensils and it is given in full. Besides these given as answers, there are the usual three pages of menus for every day in the month, a varied list that no one can complain of. An article on Quinces will be found very reasonable at this time, and with other papers on different subjects, this number is a thoroughly useful, as well as helpful one. Price per year $1.

The Cottage Hearth, published by The Cottage Hearth Co., Boston, Mass.

The opening story contains a lesson for young girls and is written by Margaret Vandegrift. A paper on a diamond mine is well illustrated. A bit on "Then and Now" by Mrs. Diaz ought to receive more than a passing glance. Hope Harvey has another one of her characteristic talks with the girls, and two pages of music will delight those who care for that. Many of the machine poems are printed for which a prize was offered. Another prize is offered this month it being a biographical puzzle to solve. The needlework pages are full of suggestions for fine work, and as a whole the number is a good one. Price per year $1.50.

The Ladies' Home Journal from the Curtis Publishing Co., Philadelphia, Penn.

The article to which all will turn first is that one by Mrs. Beecher and in a frank pleasant manner she tells of her first acquaintance with her husband of after years. Two new departments start this month one being a page for the boys, under the direction of Foster Coates, and the other being the domestic department under the able management of Maria Parloa. There are very entertaining stories and with the number and variety of its subjects we think that this number is even better than any before it. Mrs. McKinley's portrait is in the column devoted to unknown wives, and there is also a picture of Mrs. Whitney with her story. Its price is within reach of the average reader it being only $1 per year and we do not wonder that its circulation continues to increase.

The October Century has its usual invoice of excellent goods. Rudyard Kipling, the famous story teller, looks out at the reader through a pair of spectacles, indicating that habits or birth, have given him weak eyes, for he is, as yet, scarcely thirty in fact is still a youth of only twenty-six; but the portrait will be a source of satisfaction to many a reader who would like to know how the writer looks. Mr. Kennan's Siberian article gives still another indication of Russian beastliness and makes us wonder whether that individual can be civilized. Aerial navigation, that twin brother of perpetual motion, has a number of illustrations, while "Besieged by the Utes" is a thrilling description of the Colorado Campaign of 1879. General H. V. Boynton's article on "The Press and Public Men" is vigorous as is everything from his pen. "The Story of a Story" is an original sketch from Brander Matthews. "Tarrying in Nicaragua" verges on the California Series, so long running through the Century. It begins to look as though they might be a century long or possibly as extended as H. H. Bancroft's History of the Pacific Coast. It did not seem possible that anything remained to be said about Abraham Lincoln, but Col. Nicolay has an article on his personal appearance. Already the life and times of Lincoln begin to assume the magnitude of the Napoleonic memoirs.

John Peters, a novel in two volumes by Aella Greene, Springfield, Mass.

The first volume is New England through and through, as thoroughly American, as Judd's "Margaret." While not necessarily resembling them, the book suggests impressions aroused by Dr. Holmes' Elsie Venner and Edward Eggleston's "The Circuit Rider," for John Peters is a Methodist minister who finds himself in one of the out of the way towns of Western Massachusetts where, till his coming, the rigorous rule of the standing order, or Orthodox church, had never been disputed. How true to the letter are the pictures of the Reverends Jonathan Edwards Barler and Abimelech Barrett may be, LIGHT has no means of judging, but for the good of Christianity, it is to be hoped that their tribe is a small one. Such unyielding, Pecksniffian bigotry as they typify has no place in the nineteenth century. As the scene of the story is laid in the "Fifties" it is probable that the intervening thirty years have wrought many changes. How did the writer happen to take Peters for his hero's name? Was he thinking of that prevaricating 'Peters who, in his history of Connecticut, gave to that State her Blue Laws and to the country, attributes as wild as anything in the Arabian Nights? But this could not be, for John Peters is a man, Methodist, Wesleyan or New Light though he may be, who seems the soul of truth and the very example of all that he preaches. A novel with a Methodist preacher for a hero, certainly, is not so common as to be passed without more than usually careful reading. The sect and its preachers are not given to romance. Their lives are realities if any are, but here in rock ribbed, Orthodox planted New England, Mr. Greene locates his story and makes it absorbingly interesting. He develops the Davis School house vicinity finally into the thriving village of Taylor's Mills and then Dayville with as much skill as Edward Everett Hale would employ with much of the fancy of Belamy. Or better, were the majority of mankind as good and tractable as those whom he settles there, "Looking Backward" and similar stories would have no vocation. "John Peters" has an excellent mission. The love of the beautiful is cultivated and the possible results of such cultivation are skillfully shown. The thrift and enterprise of the average New Englander are manifest with his inborn love of justice and fair dealing. Mr. Greene would not have it appear that all clergymen of the Orthodox church were Barbers and Barretts for his Dr. Robinson is as genial and delightful a gentleman as any one could wish to meet. There are deacons and, again, there are deacons. All are not "Lem" Barnes nor "Squintus" Beales, for he also shows us Sherwood's and Newtons, who are true laborers in the Master's vineyard.

Covering a period of something more than ten years the story runs through the Civil War. Many of the characters have a part in that and of course win distinction. The effect of the story is healthful, its promptings good. To the reader, vice of any kind will have a darker hue from the reading of "John Peters" and virtue will be correspondingly enhanced. Our hearts go out to the orphaned Atherton and we hate "Deacon" Grout, hoping that many like him cannot exist. A writer who can thus depict right and wrong, leaving in the reader's mind a newly kindled determination to do better in life is a preacher of the most healthful character and this is just what Mr. Greene effects. He has been known for some years as a writer of excellent verse; but here he gives us prose though the poet's fancy runs through it all. He readily drops into epigrams and philosophical expressions as this, "While those who excel a man in that which is his boast, excite his jealousy and destroy his peace, those who imitate him add to his importance and heighten his enjoyment." All lovers of New England, whether at home or abroad, all those who believe in living and letting live, and those who believe in fair play and no favors, the world over, will enjoy "John Peters" and will be better and stronger for the reading.

Scientific American.

One of the greatest attractions of the late Fair, to the small boy at least, was the balloon ascension and parachute jump. But one week of such things does not satisfy him, the parachute is made with handkerchief, string and stone, and descends many times a day. Some youngsters want to know the why of things, and to them the coming of the Scientific American of Sept. 5 was opportune. In it was described to his satisfaction the whole process from the inflation of the balloon to the end of the journey. Other important articles of the month are: Report of the Meeting of the American Association; Kenwood Observatory; Lava Plains of Idaho; Railway Tunnel under the St. Clair River, between the United States and Canada; the Locust Outlook. Munn & Co., N. Y. $3 per year.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

The following is from the pen of Mrs. Ware, so long a favorite teacher in the High School. A portion of the letter, printed in the N. E. Journal of Education, and dealing with two personal cases is omitted for want of room. LIGHT would like to print all.

Lessons, or Church Work?

"Have our young girls time and strength to do both well? Is it wise to try to do both?"

Now, strange enough, one of the trials of the teacher whose opinion had been asked was the work demanded of the girls by the churches of her own denomination. Many a conversation and remonstrance had the young lady in question caused,—and she was but one of many. There must be a sale before Christmas, a New Year's entertainment, an Easter sale, an Old Folks' Concert for February 22, a May Festival, to say nothing of a fortnightly sociable, beside the Y. P. S. C. E. sociables and fairs occasionally; all these were to supply money for the church coffers, a new carpet, a new piano, some chairs for the primary rooms, etc. Thus the best energies of at least one day in the week must be devoted to church work.

"But," the young girl says, "don't you think the church work is very important?" We all know, by experience, the zeal which comes when youth find it can "manage," and the delight which inspires one when she thinks she is really doing good; yet the teacher must say "No" to the question; she herself must give up prayer-meeting often, because the next day's work requires rest. But, "Our minister says we can do this better than any one else"; and it seems cold logic to say to her that the best way to serve God is to do the daily work, to fit for a useful life. She cannot realize that the burdens of church work, as well as of the rest of life, will be ready for her after she has left school.

The young lady mentioned above had her headaches when she had been working late in the evening at some entertainment, and had spent the afternoon in getting ready; then, if her lessons were learned, she must rise early, after too little sleep, and study before breakfast. Before she had recovered from one dissipation, another was upon her. If one were to judge by the opinions and expressions of the girls, the churches could not carry on their work without such aid.

It seems like interfering with a mother's rights to ensure this custom the teacher need not look in the paper or have a Sunday bulletin to know when the church has an entertainment the girls and the lessons show it, but the mother does not see the trouble. From a conference over the matter, the girls would go away feeling that their Christian duties and privileges were to be curtailed before that apparent good of the teacher, lessons.

Could not the pastors have a voice in this matter? If the girls have learned the lessons required, have assisted at home, if necessary, can they not have the remaining time for real recreation? If the mother's pride cannot deny itself the pleasure of the thought of her daughter's executive ability, could not the church exist and work with fewer entertainments?

It is not over-study which exhausts many of our girls; it is overwork and too little true recreation."

MRS. JENNIE RICE WARE.

Excursion to North Adams.

The Fitchburg Railroad will have next Saturday an excursion to North Adams. Round trip tickets will be sold for $1.50. The number is limited to four hundred. Excursionists may return either the same day or Sunday or Monday. Those who return the same day will have sufficient time in North Adams for a trip over Hoosac Mountain.

Artistic Upholstery.

The firm of Warden & White, upholsterers, 537 Main Street, are now prepared to fill orders for the fall trade. The members of the firm are men who thoroughly understand how to do their work in an artistic manner, and make a specialty of the manufacture of Turkish furniture in many beautiful and unique designs. Their hair mattresses are exceedingly well made and stand any amount of wear and tear.

A Difference.

Current papers contain the following: "Gen." Booth, of the Salvation Army, has received a perfect ovation in Australia. Great crowds have joined in the army's processions and monster meetings have been held. The advent of Booth in the colony has given a strong impetus to revivalism.

Also repeated mention is made of the fact that John L. Sullivan's Company is stranded in the same Southern land. Virtue seems to remain in the antipodes. Do poisons and their antidotes always accompany each other? It will take a deal of Booth to counteract Sullivan, but he seems to be ahead in Australia.

Nip and Tuck.

From Vick's Floral Magazine.

The Controlling Committee of The Fresh Air Fund had just left their treasurer alone in his office. That big-hearted man at once turned his thoughts toward trying to solve the problem why the number of country-famished children must always so exceed the possibilities of the Fund—the more money the more children, it seemed—when the quick pat of bare feet and a childish voice aroused him.

"See yer, Colonel Borton, I jes found this out yer, an' he 'lows he wants some fresh air fun, too. Says his name is Nipper Stokes, an' ef you'll jes write it down 'long o' mine—mine's Tuckey Blike, you know, Tuck fer short—why him an' me kin be pard; I'll take keer of him."

"No, you wont!" retorted the animated bunch of tatters referred to, "I kin take keer o' myself—I'll show you;" and he squared off like a flash and gave his would be patron such a blow on the face as sent him backward on the floor with a thud.

Springing up, Tuckey paused not to wipe his bleeding nose, but rushed at Nipper as if to annihilate him that instant. But Nip was ready, and parrying his blow, tripped Tuck off his feet, and jumping on him commenced a series of poundings, quite worthy some long-fostered revenge.

At first, Col. Borton had thought to himself, "Its 'nip and tuck' sure enough;" but soon discovering it was mostly Nip and very little Tuck, he sprang up and pulling off the young pugilist gave him a good shaking, while exclaiming—

"You young ingrate! is this the way you return kindness? Tuckey was trying to do you a favor and befriend you."

"Well, then, what'd he pitch into me fer, when I was jes showin' him that I kin take keer o' myself?" Then turning, he sneeringly called out—"Say, Tuck, dye think now I need somebody to take k-e-e-r o' me?"

"You bet I do, the very worst way."

"Yes," said Colonel Borton, "you are in great need of somebody to take care of you, and to teach you, first thing, that though a boy may act like a brute, there's a wide difference between the two, really."

"Yes, I know. A brute's got four legs. Two's all I want."

"I don't mean that at all. Listen. A brute can't change himself into anything higher or better than what he is. Suppose he had the will to do so, he could never, by any possibility, transform himself into a being of superior order. All his life he's obliged to act out his brute nature. He cannot rise. But a boy, now—a boy like you—isn't bound down like that. He can improve himself, and continue improving until he may finally grow into a man like—well, for instance, like the mayor of our city; and be looked up to and be respected by everybody."

"Me? did you say a boy like me kin grow in to a man like the mayor? By crackey!"

"Yes, that's what I said. What hinders? Or, you might try for a man like me, if my make-up would be easier to reach."

Nip looked Col. Borton all over—up and down, and up; and then glancing around the comfortable office said:

"'Twould be a plaguey sight easier. The mayor's awful high an' mighty. Anyway, to be like you'd be good enough.—Je-whillikins! But how can a feller begin?"

"You'll have to quit rough talk and rough habits—no more fighting, bullying nor loafing around."

"Can't quit that where I live. Why, you'd be killed if you didn't jes fight yer way, every day, all the time."

"In what part of the city do you live?"

"In Tophet, if you know where that is."

"I've heard of the locality. That's where a mission was established."

"Not much. We stoned 'em off. Perlicemen come to help 'em. But we's watching for 'em. More'n a hundred o' us billies rushed onto 'em like a swarm o' rats. We jes rained stones an' mud an' brick bats at 'em an' driv 'em off; an' they stand off. They darsent shoot into a crowd o' youngsters, nowhow. No, they darsent. So an' there's too many of us to be 'rested. So we beat 'em."

"And now you're willing to leave all that and try to make a man of yourself?"

"I'd as lief."

Hereupon, Tuck, having got his bloody nose dried off, interrupted with—"See yer, Nip, if yer goin' to make fer Colonel Borton I'll strike out for the mayor, I will."

"All right; rip away. How's yer nose? You ortent to insult a feller the way you did." Then turning to Col. Borton, Nip said—"I wont know how to get my grub. Must I quit stealin' when I'm hungry?"

"You certainly must," answered Col. Borton, now thoroughly dismayed at the depravity developed by this young embryo of his prospective duplicate.

"You certainly must," he repeated; "but, if you are in earnest about beginning anew life I'll show you how to earn enough before supper to pay for it; and then you must keep on learning right along."

"By jinks! that'll be jolly."

"Here are four cents for your capital to start on. Tuckey will show you into the office of the Evening Post in this block. They have a corps of newsboys with the name of the paper on their caps and they'll sell you none unless you hand over this note I've written. When that's been read you can get two copies of their paper for two cents each, and I'll buy them of you. Now we'll see what you can do."

When the boys returned, Col. Borton paid Nip three cents apiece for the papers, saying—"Now you've increased your capital to six cents. Hurry back and buy more papers; you'll have to rush business lest everybody be supplied before you've made enough to stop on. Carry papers into all the rooms of this building. Tell the occupants that I sent you, or they wont buy of such a grimy ragmuftin."

At this Nip squared off again, but quickly subsided, saying—"I wouldn't take sich gab as that off'm anybody but you."

"I wonder what? Aren't you dirty and awfully ragged?"

"But I aint a muff nor a muffin neither."

"No, you're a newsboy. Be off with you now. I've something good to tell you when your next papers are sold." Then turning to Tuckey, who was becoming dazed with a new-born commercial ambition, he said: "You, Tuck, may go home now and help your mother with the sick baby. Tell her how you picked up a Tophet boy and how you've helped to start him in business. And remember to be on time for your 'fresh air' outing."

"Yes sir." The last words dispelled his immediate longing for commercial life, and sent him off with flying feet.

Presently Nip rushed in out of breath, saying—"Here's nine cents I got for three papers. Now, when I buy four papers there'll be one cent over. What'll I do with that?"

"Save it till you have earned a mate to it. Figures are curious things. Another odd cent will turn up if you'll keep steadily on; and then you'll put the two together and buy an extra paper."

"I'll do that. Now what's that you're goin' to tell me?"

"It's this. If you can sell two more lots of papers you'll have nineteen cents. Then I'll take you to the Newsboys' Mission Room where you can get a bath, your supper, a clear bed and your breakfast for ten cents. There you'll have nine cents left to commence business on tomorrow. You can buy morning papers, and begin early. But this is not all. At the Mission Rooms they'll put you in a good suit of clothes after your bath, if I recommend you, and I think I can."

"Yer right; you kin recommend me. I ain goin' to run away with them good clothes."

"What made you think of such a thing so quick?"

"Kase all o' them fakes in Tophet'd think was greeney not to do it. They'd peel 'em off'm me double-quick if they'd ketch me with 'em. They don't allow anybody to wear fine toggery there. They'd raise a yell and go for'im. The best feller'd git 'em an' batter 'em off. But, hooky! I must git."

"For what sort of things would he batter them!" asked the Colonel, as Nip rushed for the door. The answer came back: "Tangle legs an' opium."

"What a schooling in vice that boy has had! ejaculated his benefactor; "and yet the germ of the desire for something better is not extinguished."

When Nip had sold his next four papers he took no time to report, but with his twelve cents in hand (besides the odd one) he immediately bought six more.

In less than a minute after he had landed in the street again Col. Borton heard a panting voice at his door scolding out: "Them cussed paper boy's gettin' mad at me. See how they've yanked my rags till I'm naked. Kint I fight 'em when they bluff me?"

"No; show them the placard the Post man gave you. Why don't you stick it in your ha' you can't? Sure enough. Come here; I'll pin it on. Wait; I'll pin it up this big tear. Now run. If the boys bother you, tell a policeman; he'll settle them."

Nip's activity and seeming success had begun to disturb the regular newsboys of that locality. Considering him an interloper they decided to run him off. So upon his next appearance they met him with a yell of "Rag bag! Rag bag? Hurra for the champion Rag bag."

Nip stood still and gazed at them for an instant so hot with rage he could hardly see. Then remembering his instructions, also the good suit he should be able to show them in the morning, he pointed to his hat, then to a policeman—whose attention was already arrested by the noise—and hurried off with his papers, the policeman buying two of him at once in return, he said, for his quiet mannerly conduct when assailed.

This remark was not lost upon Nip. "I'll bet its goin' to pay no t' fight," he reflected. Selling these two papers so easily was a great lift, for the buyers were scattering to their homes rapidly. But Nip didn't realize that his parti-colored tatters fluttering as he ran, made him a genuine curiosity and helped to sell his papers. But he did realize that, sooner than he expected, he was sold out.

With his heart leaping in a tumult of joy he bounded into Col. Borton's presence, slapped his nineteen cents upon the table before him, gave a little shout of "I've done it! I've done it!" and then executed a series of somersets over the floor in continuous revolutions until the excess of his exuberance seemed to be expended. Then he sprang up saying:

"I'm so happy I feel like I'd bust."

"You have reason to be happy," responded the Colonel, "you've really done wonders. But before I take you to the Newsboy's Rooms I must tell you that if you go in there as one of them, you'll have to learn to read and write. Kind ladies are conducting a school for boys like you. Do you think you can settle down to steady business like that?"

"I know I kin, schoolin' is what I want."

"Very well then, we'll go; and the office door was locked and the two passed down into the street—a study for both men and angels.

When Nip found himself confronting a mirror in the bath-room of his new quarters, he was at first transfixed by full view of his dirty, tattered image. But recovering his wits, he hastily shook his fist, exclaiming: "Mebbe you think you're Nipper Stokes! You'll find out yer mistake, directly. Good-bye, you onry mud-snipe; nobody'll ever see you ag'in."

When a bath, trimmed hair and fresh clothing had completed his transformation, Nip rushed to the mirror and was again mute with astonishment. Regaining his speech he said exultingly: "Didn't I tell you!"

"It was not him you told," said his amused patron, looking in the door.

"That's so; 'tother feller's slunk. Hip hurrah! but hold on; I musn't turn somersets now, must I?"

"No you must act as that new boy looks. Now, come; and I'll see you seated at your supper."

Some thoughtful woman had sent flowers for the table and there was a bouquet at each boy's plate. The sight of them electrified Nip. He had never seen a flower at Tophet. On the street that day his eyes had lingered upon the few displayed in show windows, and had followed longingly those in moss baskets borne by flower-girls. Now he had some for his very own. Must he eat them? he wondered. They were a part of his supper. But O, they were too pretty to eat. He'd wait and see what the other boys would do with theirs. And now Col. Borton was bidding him a kindly good-night; and Nip, well content, was left in this homeless boys' paradise.

MARIA BARRETT BUTLER.

"When in Rome, do as the Romans do."—Ambrose.

Only a week at the shore! yet what an amount of benefit one can derive from seven long, sunny days, beside the glorious sea. How invigorating is even the first taste of its balmy breath, as it blows fresh and sweet from its fragrant bed, and curls the soft tressels of hair, that cling about the face. How the salt spray, the dancing waves fling abroad so saucily, tingle the cheek with a faint reflection of the seashell, and start the slow blood into a swifter current through the tired frame. Awe-inspiring, and soul-refreshing is the grandeur of the sea; lifting one out of the littleness of small things, into the higher atmosphere of eternal greatness; sweeping over one's soul, and washing away with the tide, all narrowness of creed and egotistical dogmas, and broadening the horizon of the inner life, into a fuller conception of the Creator's plan.

As one looks over the quiet water at sunrise, when the rosy god is flinging his golden arrows into its peaceful bosom, and the gentle ripples glisten and gleam in the amber light, and the sleeping tide is hushed in pleasant dreams, all is still and calm. Far in the distance the white sails look like huge swans on a placid lake, while the great steamers, gliding so swiftly through the waters, leave long silvery trails behind them, like the shining sides of cold serpents. On the beach the white sands glisten in the sunlight, and the damp sea-weed clings to the earth, as though glad of its contact with solid ground. Dainty shells, and sea-worn pebbles, gleam in the sunlike precious jewels; and one gathers a pocket full of them, almost as eagerly as though they were in fact diamonds and pearls; and later perhaps, they may really become quite as precious, as mementoes, of this happy hour by the sea.

By and by when the sun has climbed higher into the heavens, and the slowly waking tide is making soft billows against the shore, the surf is thronged with bathers, and here, while watching the merry antics of the laughing crowd, one has a good opportunity to study one side of human nature.

All sorts and conditions of men, women and children, splash about in close proximity to each other, diving and swimming, laughing and shrieking, and dashing the water into each other's faces in playful abandon. Often the comic side strikes one so irresistibly, that it is impossible not to have a hearty laugh, at the expense of some dignitary, who, having dropped so much of himself with his clothes, looks forlorn enough, till the friendly sea covers up all deficiencies, leaving only his head bobbing about with the waves, like a small pumpkin afloat; and when some stout matron, in close fitting bathing suit of gorgeous hue, trips down to the water, and timidly wades out, up to her waist, while she screams and tosses her arms in anything but a graceful gesture, one cherished ideal of "golden-haired mermaids chanting their melodious song over the briny deep," swiftly vanish, leaving only stern reality's truthful picture, and one calls to mind the words of Thomas Gradgrind, in Dicken's hard times, "Facts, sir; nothing but Facts."

Dear little children, whose plump white bodies are held firmly in the strong arms of "nurse," spatter the water about, dancing and crowing, and looking like rosy little cupids. While pet dogs frolic about the sands, dashing in and out of the water at the beck and call of their master or mistress.

All sorts of odd people one meets at the seaside, and having nothing better to do, how natural it is to give reign to the imagination, and weave romances about the faces we see.

A slim youth, dark sunburned face, large melancholy brown eyes, and dazzling white teeth, seemed to be a special favorite with young and old; and the slight foreign accent when he spoke, told that though among us, he was not of us. Always the gayest of the gay, in the crowd of merry-makers, there was a shadowy something, that seemed to set him apart from the rest, while the look of sadness in the dark eyes, even in his merriest mood, roused my woman's curiosity to know the cause. A little later I overheard bits of talk in his soft broken English, that soon solved the mystery: the death of "Mudder" who was always a "saint," and also a dearly loved sister, in that far off foreign home; a long illness that had prevented his reaching them in time, roused the sympathy of my mother's heart, and sent my thoughts traveling through space, to the bed-side of that dying mother who called in vain for her boy; while the homesick look in his face, made me long to comfort him; for sorrow makes us all of one kin.

The married flirt with her train of youthful admirers, the plump widow in search of "number two," and the girl of the period, all have their place in the ever changing panorama of sea-side pictures. Speaking of pictures, brings to mind an odd specimen of humanity, whose tall slim form passed before my eyes so often, that I was forced to notice his peculiarities. "Camera fiend" was one of the appellations given him, for camera in hand he wandered about solitary and alone, seeming only bent on collecting views of the surrounding country. Scarcely ever speaking unless spoken to, and shunning all friendly overtures, he won for himself the name of "Lonesome."

Who that has ever watched the sea at night, when the angry waves, black and threatening, beat against the shore, and the heavy breakers, with their crests of white foam, dashing over the rocks in wild abandon, has not felt the wonderful power, the fearful significance, of the mighty deep. How the swiftly rising tide, that but a few short hours before, seemed dimpling the great waters with sunny smiles, suddenly flings off all restraint, and with demoniac power, slashes, and dashes about with cruel fierceness, reaching out long black arms, higher, and higher, on the shrinking sands, as though it would drag the whole earth down, into its mighty depths. How the white sails are tossed about like the worn-out playthings of a naughty child; while the monstrous waves fling themselves over the sides of great steamers, with threatening insolence.

Overhead, the purple clouds drift across the azure of the sky, hiding the gleam of the stars, that now and then peep out from behind the dusky curtain; while the pale, sweet face of the moon, as it comes slowly into sight, throws a silvery ray across the tossing sea, like that tender touch of the Master's hand, when he said, "Peace, be still."

Those Slow Trains.
IN LIGHT of Sept. 19th, I saw a joke by Artemas Ward. The following is similar to it, but the author unknown. A gentleman while riding on a Southern railroad noticed the bell ring. When he asked the cause, he was told it was to avoid running into some cows ahead. The train soon started on again, and in a short time the bell rang and it stopped once more. Then the man exasperated said "I believe we have caught up with those cows again."

A Tale of Love.

In the sunset's golden splendor,
I beheld a tale of love,
And it came most like a meteor
From the scene I saw above.

In the meadow I was lying,
With the river close in view,
While the sun in grandeur dying
Made its ever fond adieu.

For there like a lover parting,
Stood the sun with longing glance
While the river still departing
Swept along in vigilance.

Like a maiden seemed the evening,
Kissed by sunset's fond adieu,
And at morn in brighter meaning
Came the lover firm and true.

—Herr Cherytree.

Miss Gertrude L. March, who advertises in another column, is the highly successful or ganist of Grace Church. She has had the advantages of long instruction from Mr. H. J. Lang of Boston, to whom she refers.

Mrs. Lizzie C. Roath.

This lady, for so many years the teacher of the infant department in the Grace M. E. Church S. S. and for the past year engaged in city mission work in Lowell, is going to New Haven, Conn. Last Sunday, she met the infant class in Grace Church and as usual gave them a treat from her inexhaustible fund. Monday she went to New Haven to address the bodies in whose behalf she will labor for the coming year. These are the young men of Trinity Episcopal Church, Yale College, Y. M. C. A. and the Davenport Church Y. P. S. C. E. Her address was in Davenport Church. The movement, thus under way, is calculated to influence certain classes that usually do not attend church. A better woman for such work could not be found. Mrs. Roath has enthusiasm, devotion and attainments all rendering her a host in herself. If the bulwarks of sin ever do give way, it will be through the efforts of workers like her.

Principal Bartlett.

In the language of Sam Lawson in "Old Town Folks," "The best on us does get took unawares sometimes." The Chandler Street principal, Wm. H. Bartlett, as he mounted the steps of the school superintendent's office last Saturday morning, had little notion of the fate in store for him. "Grab that boy" was the salutation received as he opened the door; but the boy was active and slippery, the master not so small and quick as he was thirty years ago, and the grabbing was not altogether a matter of words; but he seized him, though at the expense of a badly wrenched or sprained foot. Medical aid was summoned and Mr. Bartlett was removed to his home. For the past week he has had ample opportunity to reflect on the story of the chestnuts and the cats paw along with such suggestion of juvenile depravity as the incident merited. Numerous friends have testified to their interest by calling and the youngsters on Chandler Street are heroically endeavoring to reconcile themselves to their principal's absence, which by the way is the first instance of a whole day off since his coming to Worcester, in 1856. The boys sometimes think their teacher's quite too healthy.

Flannel Cakes.

BY NELLIE CAMPBELL BEDFORD.

Four cups flour; one-half cup white-corn meal; four eggs; one tablespoon butter, melted; two cups milk; one teaspoonful salt; two level teaspoons Cleveland's Baking Powder. Beat the yolks and whites of the eggs separately. Sift the flour, meal, salt and baking powder together, add the milk, egg yolks and melted butter and beat hard. Stir in the lightly beaten whites and bake on a griddle.

Only Cleveland's baking powder, and its mixtures are made for that.

The cake dries out, gets husky, crumbles, or turns less like bakers' bread, it isn't bad luck but bad baking powder.

Cake keeps moist, keeps its natural flavor when made with Cleveland's Baking Powder. One special excellence of Cleveland's.

Good to Eat.

Apple Shape.—Boil a pound of sugar with half a pint of water, and skim. Add one pound of pared and quartered apples and boil till tender and clear. Add the juice of two lemons and the grated rind of one. Pass it through a sieve, together with half a box of gelatine, dissolved in a little cold water. Separate four eggs, and beat the white to a stiff froth. Mix them with the apple, and cool in a mould. The yolks of the eggs make the sauce, with a quart of milk, sugar, and flavoring, and boiled thick till creamy.

Cream Puffs.—Boil one tumbler of water and a quarter of a pound of butter together. While boiling stir in a tumbler and a half of sifted flour, all at once. It is sufficiently cooked by the time it is mixed. When cool, stir in one at a time five unbeaten eggs. Drop on greased tins or gem pans, and bake fifteen to twenty minutes. For the cream use two eggs, half a cup of sugar, half a cup of sifted flour, half a pint of milk, and butter the size of an egg. Boil till thick, and flavor with one teaspoonful of vanilla. Cut the puffs round, in halves; fill the lower part with cream, lay the upper halves on, and sprinkle with powdered sugar.

Apple Jack.—Make the same as apple pie, leaving out the sugar and spice; when done take the upper crust from the under one, spreading half the apple on the inside of each crust; sprinkle a handful of sugar and put small pieces of butter on the apple, and lay the upper crust, apple side up, on the under one. Eat while warm, as it is not good when cold.

Omelette Souffle.—Break six eggs separately; beat the yolks of four. one teaspoonful of flour, three tablespoonfuls powdered sugar, a pinch of salt, and flavoring together; beat the whites till stiff; mix all lightly; pour into a buttered dish and place in a hot oven. It is done when risen and lightly brown. Roll out on a hot dish, sprinkle with powdered sugar and serve.

Puff Balls.—Put one gill of water and one ounce of butter to boil; when boiling, add one gill of flour, stir until you have a smooth dough, take from the fire, and when cool add one unbeaten egg. When this is well beaten in add another, and beat continuously for five minutes. Drop this mixture in tiny little balls on greased baking tins; bake in a quick oven for fifteen minutes.

Cream cakes.—One cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, three-fourths cup of milk, two eggs, beaten separately, 1½ cups of flour, 1½ teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Bake in three layers. Cream for filling: One-half pint of milk, one teaspoonful of corn-starch, one egg, one teaspoonful of vanilla, sweeten to taste. Heat milk to scalding, in which cook the cornstarch stirred smooth in a little cold milk, add the eggs last, flavor and spread when cold.

Dessert Chestnuts.—Roast them well, taking off the husks. Dissolve four ounces of lump sugar in a wineglass of water, then add the juice of a lemon. Put the chestnuts into this liquor, stew them over a slow fire for ten minutes, add sufficient orange-flower water to flavor the syrup, grate lump sugar over them, and serve up quite hot.

The French method of administering castor oil to children is to pour the oil into a pan over a moderate open fire, break an egg into it and stir up; when it is done flavor with a little salt or sugar or currant jelly.

People who are fond of sea bathing in summer should know that a most effective and yet simple substitute for sea water is a cup of rock salt dissolved in warm water and added to the bath. A warm salt bath of this kind is the most refreshing tonic for an exhausted body. But don't go out of doors after taking it. Just before going to bed is the right time.

For perturbing a room, pastilles to be burnt, may be made at home, at small expense, from the following formula: Eight drachms caracilla bark, two drachms yellow sanders, four drachms of gum benzoin, two drachms styrax, two drachms oilbanum, one and one-half drachms nitre, six ounces of charcoal, mucilage of tragacanth, sufficient quantity. Reduce the substances to a powder, form into a paste with the mucilage, make into tiny coins, dry in a moderate oven.

Meat is not especially injurious except when excessive eaten. Few should eat it more than once a day, and then very moderately. It is not indispensable, and a family might get along without it for almost any length of time and suffer no real injury if provided with a wholesome variety of vegetable food. The health of many families might be much improved by the change. Dr. Cragie, author of a work on the practice of medicine, says: "Diet consisting of animal food is not requisite either to preserve health or to maintain strength, and diet of articles from which the flesh of animals is altogether excluded is perfectly adequate to the sustenance of the human body in a state of good health and strength."

Dr. Adam Smith in his "Wealth of Nations," says: "It may indeed be doubted whether butchers' meat is anywhere a necessary of life. Grain and other vegetables, with the help of milk, cheese and butter, or oil, (where butter is not to be had,) it is known from experience, can, without any butchers, meat, afford the most plentiful, the most wholesome, the most nourishing and the most invigorating diet.

There should be a small table about the height of the range or stove for use as a resting-place for utensils when omelets, griddle cakes, etc., are made. It should be covered with zinc.

To remove rust from steel, rub with kerosene, and soak for a day, polishing with emery dust and kerosene.

A wet towel heated with a hot flatiron passed over it will often alleviate the pain of ach'ing heads. With two flatirons, one heating while the other is held by the patient, hot applications are easily made.

In cleaning black stockings, it is not necessary to wash the entire stocking every time they are done up. By a little care the feet only may be washed, and thus the color may be retained much longer. Stockings should never be put into the suds until they are turned wrong side out.

The tomato may be traced back to the sixteenth century, and although it is mentioned since then by several writers, it did not become a marketable edible till 1829.

Silver Things

Of silver through and through never grow old in the sense that other articles grow old—age adds to their value. Passing down from generation to generation, and even more carefully treasured by the latest holder, they become priceless mementoes of the past.

Not Idle

Reminders—the life of real silver is long, useful, satisfactory—but loved and honored members of the family of table things, outranking even fine old china in the esteem of the household.

It is no Wonder

That articles of silver are in so great request for presentation—what other material could be so appropriate?

That "Make Believe"

Silver is useful is undoubted—it supplies the need of today—we question if it ever really cared for by its possessors except for the use it serves, while in the glory of its short-lived glitter.

It Isn't True

It hasn't even the appearance of truth, every piece seems to be saying, "I try to look like silver—I'd like to make you believe I am silver, but you know and I know I'm a cheat—a lie."

There is

Other beside 'silver plated friendship.' Should not the gift of TRUE friendship be something that IS true, something of real value, something that is what it seems to be, something of silver?

Cost for Cost

The baser article will, of course, make more of a showing—a silver dollar covers a wide expanse of cheaper stuff, but a silver trifle will be treasured and its honor gratefully remembered long after the sham gift and memory of the giver have passed away.

Gorham Silver Ware

Is the recognized standard; to their cunning artificers is due the credit of originating the greater part of the beautiful designs known to the silver world. We have added to the stock of our newly re-organized silver department an excellent choice of the newest productions of this most famous factory, "Gorham's." NOW ON VIEW.

Worcester Polytechnic Institute.

At a meeting of the "Tech" held Wednesday evening, the following officers were chosen President, A. MacKay '93; vice president, N. M. Paull '93; secretary, H. W. Bowen '93. The directors are Prof. Kimball, President MacKay, and F. H. Metcalf '93. Directors from '92 and '94 were not elected. It was voted to hold meetings on Tuesday evenings during the year, the next meeting will be next Tuesday, and rules will then be adopted and assignments made for succeeding meetings.

The athletic directors have voted not to have a field meeting this Fall. All the energy available in school will be put into football, and everyone hopes that at least the despised "Academy" may this year be defeated. The first game with the Academy occurs this afternoon. Arrangements are also being made for games with Amherst and the Harvard freshman. The eleven are practicing every night and a coach is to be secured at once, Lake from Harvard if possible.

The competition for election to the W. P. I. board, closes Monday noon for the Senior and Middle classes. F. B. Knight has been elected editor-in-chief. L. W. Rawson, assistant business manager.

The Middle and Junior classes have organized as follows:—

Middle class:—president, A. D. Finn; vice-president, J. A. Derby; secretary, Nathan Heard; treasurer, W. H. Larkin; athletic director, L. P. Strong; baseball manager, F. H. Metcalf.

Junior class:—president, E. B. Whipple; vice-president, C. A. Burt; secretary, C. G. Harris; treasurer, C. B. Allen; base ball manager, D. W. Bradt.

At a meeting of the Athletic Association held last week, the following officers were elected: president, F. A. Morse, '92; vice-president, R. C. Cleveland, '93; secretary, E. B. Whipple, '94; treasurer, R. H. Hammond, '92. Messrs. Southgate and Camp were approved as directors from classes '92 and '93 respectively.

High School.

Wednesday morning the usual regular exercises were held in the hall. The program, which was fully up to the standard of excellence, was as follows: reading,—“The Chambered Nautilus,” Miss Bessie Dean, '92; select reading from “Julius Caesar,” William H. Orr, '93; violin obligato from Wagner, Miss Winifred Crane, '94; declamation “Dorothy Q,” Miss Maria Wright, '92.

The classes in book-keeping under Mr. Mussy, will be resumed next Monday.

The boys who desire to be placed upon the football eleven met on the grounds of the Worcester Tennis Club last Wednesday afternoon, and consumed the time in practice. The school has, without doubt, fine stock and under the efficient management of Mr. Allie Warren, it can compete successfully with any.

Last week the eleven played a practice game with the eleven from Dalzell's school, but were defeated by a score of 12 to 4.

One of the French teachers had a very arduous duty the other day when it became necessary to explain a jabbe to one of her pupils.

The Bibles have returned from the bindery, dressed in a gaudy red dress. Quite a novelty.

The next meeting of the New England Association of colleges and preparatory schools, will be held at Cambridge, in Harvard Hall, Oct. 16 and 17 next. Dr. G. Stanley Hall of this city, will speak on “The outlook in higher education.”

The opening exercises in the morning have been changed some this year. Monday and Thursday there will not be any singing for the three upper classes, but Mr. Chapin will talk over with the pupils the important happenings all over the country that have been read in the newspapers the day before. The other days, half the time will be singing and the other half on the newspapers. The fourth class will sing Monday and Thursday in Mr. Nolan's room. “This is something that has been tried before but has always failed” and Mr. Chapin who is a great “newspaperist” will probably make it interesting. Why should not all the pupils read the newspaper?—Fitchburg Mail.

The above concerns a gentleman who was valedictorian of his 1876 class in the W. H. S. and is now the successful Principal of the Fitchburg High School.

OVER ON OUR STREET.

One of our best natured denizens believes in being on good terms with every one. He has a good story to tell every time I meet him. If he has the blues he keeps the same to himself. He cares not a whit whether the man talked to be rich or poor. "Years ago," he remarked the other day, "when I was an apprentice I went to dinner at twelve and on my return at one p.m. I invariably met at a certain corner Mr. F— M—, a man much older than myself and accounted wealthy. I always raised my hat and made my very politest bow but he only looked at me as much as to say, 'Who are you any way?' This had been going on a long time and I was bound to get a bow from him so one day as we neared, I laid all the money I had in the palm of my hand, it was a double eagle and as usual raised my hat. What a change. The sight of that bit of gold wrought miracles in Mr. —'s face. He smiled the broadest kind of a smile and from that day onward he began bowing as soon as he saw me. I tell you gold is a mighty eye opener and back limberer."

I frequently meet a father and his son, though they are very seldom together. They are so differently constituted that it would be difficult for them to keep step. The father carries a cane and he switches off every stray leaf possible. He is on the look out for every cat and dog along his way, and there is not a child on his route who does not exclaim with joy as he comes along. He is the man who takes his vacation by just using a little more time in going to and from his meals. Now the son sees nothing around him. His eyes are cast down, but he frequently smiles, apparently at his own thoughts. Trees, flowers, pets of all kinds, are all lost to him. He sees absolutely nothing about him yet he is far from blind. Does this difference arise from a little near-sightedness? Doubtless he is just as happy as his father but in a different way. One looks outward, the other inward. The father, in his own enjoyment, makes others happy and, for this reason, his manner is preferable. But we cannot, all, have the same ways and motions.

The beginning of school brings many surprises to the little folks. One small boy found himself sent up over a certain grade. He was not expecting it, but he was pleased, all the same. A little friend said to him, "Georgie, were you promoted?" "Promoted, I guess I was; I was more than promoted, I was elevated."

A little tot had learned her golden text for Sunday School, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want." She wished to enter her aunt's room but aunty did not wish visitors, just then. "I want to say my golden text," is the remark of infancy. "Oh speak it through the keyhole," says aunty; and this is the way the 23d Psalm, or a part of it, went through, "The gold is my shepherd, I shall not want."

Mr. O. B. Hadwen is chairman of the committee on publication and discussion and a member of the committee on fruits of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society.

Mr. Albert A. Lovell of Medfield was in Worcester, Tuesday. He reports his father, Mr. Joseph Lovell, as in fair health.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Dad's Girl," the drama presented at Lothrop's this week, besides being a very attractive play in itself has additional interest to Worcester play-goers in that it is placed among scenes with which many are familiar.

The company now playing it at Lothrop's seems to be giving it all the artistic finish which it requires.

Miss Katherine Rober as Miss Malvina Sophie Hoskins and Max Freeman as Stephen Wainwright are the leaders and receive excellent support from the others.

The farce which preceded the drama was entitled "The Baker's Daughter." The play will be repeated this afternoon and evening.

The announcement for next week states that the French society drama "Claire and the Forgemaister" will be presented with Kate Glassford as Claire. The curtain raiser will be "Slasher and Crasher."

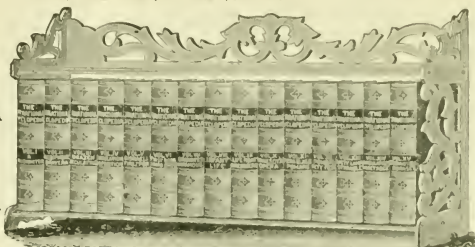

Geo. T. Pierce, a member of Post 10, G. A. R., is laid up by a serious attack of illness.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Hope.—The Ladies Social Union of Hope Church will observe, next week Thursday afternoon, October 15, its tenth anniversary. All past members are especially invited to be present. A social, an interesting program of addresses and a supper have been arranged for their entertainment.

Park.—The ecclesiastical council to examine Rev. Inmann L. Wilcox in regard to his fitness for the pastorate of Park Church met at the church Tuesday afternoon and organized with Rev. A. E. P. Perkins, D. D., as moderator and Rev. Laurence Perry as scribe. It consisted of the pastors and delegates from the Congregational churches of this city, Leicester and Shrewsbury, Rev. Dr. Ebenezer Cutler, Rev. Dr. Perkins, Rev. Dr. George H. Gould, Rev. W. G. Tuttle, Rev. S. D. Hosmer, Rev. M. H. Hitchcock, Rev. R. M. Taft, Rev. Leon D. Bliss and Rev. Geo. S. Pelton of Higganum, Conn., the first pastor of the church. Rev. Mr. Wilcox read to the council a paper which he had prepared, stating what had been his education and his beliefs, which paper was highly satisfactory to the council, who voted to proceed with the installation exercises in the evening.

The program in the evening opened with a voluntary and anthem, followed by the statement of the council by the scribe, Rev. Laurence Perry. Prayer was offered by Rev. R. M. Taft and after another anthem, Rev. Laurence Perry read from the Scriptures. Following the singing of a hymn by the congregation Rev. Archibald McCullagh, D. D., preached a powerful sermon from the text 2 Kings, 11:15. Rev. Dr. Perkins offered the installing prayer and the choir responded. In behalf of the sister churches Rev. C. M. Southgate gave the right hand of fellowship to the pastor; A. H. Cooldige of Leicester gave the address to the people, gave some excellent instruction in his usual pleasant manner; the congregation sang a hymn and the service closed with benediction by the new pastor.

METHODIST.

The next meeting of the Social Union, next Monday evening at Trinity Church, will be of more than usual interest as the presidents of the Boston, Providence and Springfield Unions will be entertained as guests. Supper will be served at 7:15.

Grace.—Tomorrow evening, at seven o'clock, the cantata, "God is Love," will be given under the direction of C. F. Hanson. This is the third presentation in America, having already been sung twice in the First Universalist Church of this city. The choir will be assisted by the following soloists: Sopranos, Mrs. H. W. Johnson, Mrs. L. W. Briggs, Miss Nellie Layng; alto, Miss Flora Minor; tenor, Geo. O. Sawin of Gardner; baritone, A. L. Farwell. There will be an orchestra of eight pieces. The pastor will make a short address, appropriate to the occasion.

Y. P. S. C. E.

The annual meeting of the Local Union will be held next Tuesday evening at Park Church, corner of Elm and Russell streets. The election of officers will take considerable time but there will be one speaker, Rev. Webster Woodbury of Millford. Contrary to the notice previously given, there will be a contest for the holding of the Union's banner. As at first arrange there was to be a competition only at the regular bi-monthly meetings, but this has been changed so that hereafter all meetings will be included. The rule of the contest is that the society having the largest percentage of its members present at the meeting shall have the keeping of the banner until the next contest.

Connelly—Ho.

Thursday afternoon at three o'clock in St. Anne's Church, Miss Sarah A. Holt was married to Joseph A. Connelly of the Boston Store, by Rev. Wm. Finneran, of St. John's parish, a cousin of the bride. Jeremiah Sexton was groomsman and Miss Margaret Griffin bridesmaid. The bride was attired in a white silk dress with veil and orange blossoms and carried a bouquet of white roses. The bridesmaid was dressed in pale blue and carried a bouquet of pink roses. After the ceremony a reception was held at the bride's home, 7 Prospect Street. In the evening, the happy couple started on a wedding trip to Boston. On their return they will reside at 23 Hawley Street. There were a large number of presents, including a chamber set from the bride's sister, a marble clock and much silverware.

About Folks.

Mr. Samuel D. Waite and family, lately, made a fishing excursion to Hubbardston, Mrs. W.'s old home. The honors of the day belonged to Miss Alice who caught fifteen, quite distancing all the others.

Comrade Alfred S. Smedley has trees of the finest apples in his Halifax, Vt., abode as a fine basket of them on LIGHT's table bears testimony They taste as well as they look.

Lieut. John E. Lancaster, son of Mr. Frank E. Lancaster and interested with his father in cotton manufacturing, is announced as engaged to be married to Miss Agnes M. Fanning, daughter of Mr. David H. Fanning. Ten years ago the Lieutenant was a High School boy. Since then he has been a member of the Light Infantry and is now the Adjutant of the 2d Regiment, M. V. M.

Medfield.

Prompted thereto, possibly by the visit of the Worcester Society of Antiquity, a similar organization has been effected in this town. It was incorporated as the Medfield Historical Society. Among other officers, is found the name of Albert A. Lovell as secretary. That he will make a good one, goes without saying. The president is William S. Tilden, who has already written a history of the town. The town has generously voted the use of rooms in the town hall for an indefinite period.

Red Jacket.

"The Waterloo Library and Historical Society desire your presence at the unveiling of the monument to Red Jacket, chief of the Senecas, at his birthplace. Ceremonies at Canoga, Seneca Co., N. Y., 2 p.m., Wednesday, October 14, 1891. Oration by Hon. W. C. Bryant of Buffalo, N. Y.

S. R. WELLS, President."

The foregoing is a copy of an invitation sent to LIGHT. Nothing would give greater pleasure than the power to accept and be present, but time and distance prevent. It will be an honor to assist in paying respect to a man whom even his foes respected. A king among savages, he would have been great among those counting themselves far his superiors. No response more eloquent was ever uttered than when, neglected by his hosts, at a council fire and tardy recognition was made he refused the proffered seat saying, "The earth is my mother, I will repose on her bosom."

Red Jacket was a Chief of the Senecas, one of the renowned six nations. Born in 1752, he lived till 1830. Washington gave him a silver medal. Though once in league with the British, late in life he was of service to the Americans. This act of the Historical Association comes none too soon. New York is at last awake to monumental significance. Saratoga's shaft lifts up its head and nods to Oriskany's, with the latter's memories of Herkimer. Auburn's tribute to Logan has long waited for this companion piece in Seneca and both will, over the interval, signal to the tower which crowns the height near Elmira, commemorating Sullivan's expedition against the very tribesman of Red Jacket. New England rejoices at this historical tribute. Let Maine Woods and Waters.

From Forest and Stream,

The fatigues of the previous days contributed to a lengthy morning nap, and we were aroused from our slumbers by the presence of strangers in camp. Turning out and making a hasty toilet, we find the genial Dr. George F. Emerson, of Boston, and guide, in waiting to tender the compliments of their camp on the Middle Jo Mary, some six miles distant, where some half dozen professional and business men for many years have followed Thoreau's example and made their camp on its romantic shores. With kindly forethought, knowing that we would be fatigued after the journey, they brought with them numbers of beautiful trout, that our feasting and enjoyment of life in the woods might begin with the first morning. Courtesies that were highly enjoyed by us frequently exchanged between the camps, and the writer indulges the hope that he may again grasp the friendly hands and share the boundless hospitality of the jolly campers on the Little Jo Mary.

Going down to the water's edge, we find an oblong lake some four or five miles in extent, surrounded by dense forest growth, now looming up in the morning sunshine with the summit of Kathadin in the back ground some twenty miles away. As we look out upon the sea we realize that—

"High mountains are a feeling, but the hum
Of human cities torture."

What a quiet, restful scene! How we expand our lungs and drink in the health-giving ozone! There in the cove yonder are a mother doe and her full-grown young disporting themselves in the water, here within a few rods saunter about a black duck and her brood of ducklings as proud and unconcerned as if no enemy were near, there a break in the water as some monster trout completes his morning meal.

Our reverie is disturbed by the advent of a canoe and a cheery voice sings out: "Get aboard, and let us at them." We are soon enjoying the pleasures of the sport, and provide an ample supply for the larder, returning to the water all that could not be used, as it is our rule never to waste.

The declining sun found us at the water's edge in wonderment at the play of colors in cloud and on mountain top. Streamers of green and gold shot up to the zenith until it seemed as if the dome of heaven was decorated by angel hands, and the mountain tops were clothed in a living, brilliant purple that shaded into darkness with the setting sun. The day ended, we gather around the campfire, with trees hoary with age for companions all around us.

"'Tis eve, 'tis night, a holy quiet broods
Over the mate world; winds, waters are at peace,
The beasts lie couched amid rustling woods,
The fishes slumber in the sounds and seas,
No twitting bird sings farewell from the tree."

The evening wind sings a crescendo through the surrounding forest, and swings its censor of incense breathing balsam and pine; and we drop off in blissful, restful slumber until again

"The vapors around the mountains curled Melt into morn and light awakes the world."

And so go days and weeks; and who shall say that we did not regret when the hour of parting came? But stern duty calls, and as if from a gentle reverie aroused we return to the treadmill of every day life, looking forward in fond anticipation to the time when we will again make our camp on the Little Jo Mary.
Geo. M. ALDER,

Worcester Mass.
A certain small boy in this Worcester of ours has learned geography enough to know that heat increases as we go towards the South. Sunday, he was sent on an errand which necessitated about a mile of tramping. Returning, quite flushed and heated, he remarked, that he must have gone as far South as the equator.

English Literature.
The classes that Mrs. Annie Russell Marble is conducting are excellent illustrations of deserved success. Beginning in her own parlors, she found herself, by increased numbers, compelled to seek more extended quarters and so sought the school-rooms of Mrs. Morgan in the Y. M. C. A., building. Here, meeting Mondays, she has two classes, of twenty pupils each. These pupils are, in the main, former High School girls, thus testifying to their appreciation of her worth and ability. The range of studies will include Shakespeare, George Eliot, Ruskin, Emerson, Browning and Charles Dudley Warner.

Mrs. Marble is a graduate of the High School, Class of 1882, Smith College 1886, and from 1887 to 1890 was a highly successful teacher in the school.

This work that she is doing must be of the utmost utility.

Do you know that a Suit of Clothes can be bought for almost any price you could name?

Do you know that in a great many cases one suit of clothes will LOOK about as good as another suit that would cost you $5 or $10 more?

Do you know that a great part of the price you pay for the cheap suit of clothes is made up of the cost in making them look like the better kinds?

Do you think that the cheap kinds will continue to look like the better kinds after a week or two of service?

Supposing you do appear to save a dollar or two on a suit of clothes, of what will that avail when the real character of the goods and the making is made manifest in less than a month, and you are compelled to say:—

"Well, I cannot go with you to call—my clothes look so badly."

We have never talked much to you about cheap clothes.

We talk a good deal to you about good clothes.

We never tire in telling you about the genuine quality in our cloths.

We have no hesitation in telling you how well they are made.

We are not afraid to declare our knowledge and experience, and that they are at your ser-

We know good cloth.

We know good workmanship.

We know correct styles.

We will have nothing else.

This season we place on our counts SUITS that we believe will please you.

That they are altogether best for you to buy we know.

That for $12, $15 or $20 we give a better suit for style and service, everybody ought to know.

Do you know this important fact?

You ought to know it.

Will you take a little time that we may prove it all to you?

We'll talk it over with you any day.

But it won't require much talking. You'll see the difference quick enough.

Gentlemen:—Having purchased two of your Heaters one now in use three years, the other 2 years, I can safely say we could hardly keep house without one. Look at this picture and read.

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long, anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a housekeeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility. One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

VOL. IV. WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1891.

No. 7

Come forth into the light of things; let nature be your Teacher.—Wordsworth.

We are getting the extremes of weather.

One week in October we return to Summer wear, and merchants withdraw their Fall goods from the window.

The weather observer declares the weather unparalleled and looks up all that Wiggins, Foster and other weather cranks have written. After all, our talk and thoughts will make no difference with the situation.

We shall have to take things as they come, whether we like them or not; still the weather and one's health are inexhaustible themes. We cannot make our hair black nor white, that is by fair processes, but we persist in discussing just such absurd questions.

"How are you" is a stock expression. Every man says it to his neighbor and neither waits for an answer, unless a man is really ill and then he is likely to hore his neighbor in telling about his condition. The truth is every man likes to talk about himself and if he can get the chance he will set forth his individual merits, forgetting that his woes are best kept within his own breast.

But it is impossible to formulate a rule of conversation that shall be applicable everywhere. The world famous conversationalists were, at the same time, ineffable bores on occasion. It was only Boswell who followed Samuel the First unflinchingly and as for the Second Samuel, his portly figure standing alone, with closed eyes and fingers rolling the detached button, while words flowed on unceasingly, is a picture familiar, at least, in the fancy of all lovers of literature.

Who is the good talker? That depends. The French Queen of Speech declared a certain listener a most entertaining man, yet dumb from his birth, he had not opened his mouth; but had acted the dummy while she rambled on, only too glad to find one who interposed no barrier to her amazing volubility. He is not the best talker who rattles off the most words. They may be as empty as bubbles. Few people who are well posted can fail to make entertaining statements of what they really know.

During the past year, a certain Harvard professor came up to this city to lecture to a class of boys on "Manliness in Boys." While seemingly a valuable theme, does not second thought declare the errand one like carrying coals to Newcastle? Are not boys, as a rule, more manly than men themselves? Do boys in dealing with each other do the mean things that men, in business, are constantly guilty of?

Would not the average man prefer to have his case judged by the average boy rather than by any person, seasoned by the years of long service in trade or profession? The boy will have no business maxim of "Every man for himself" before his eyes but he will be ten times less selfish than his elders. Would a boy in dividing the items left by a deceased playmate, appropriate for himself the choicest portions? Yet many a man acting as the executor of his friend's estate has robbed the widow and the fatherless.

A certain Worcester tradesman refused to purchase goods of a wholesaler in a neighboring city if the latter continued to sell his ware to a man who was a rival in a small way. Both men were members of churches and both would claim to exemplify the Eleventh Commandment. How is that for manliness! There never was a boy who could do a meaner thing in dealing with his fellows than the grown man will excuse himself for doing through the exigency of trade.

Preach manliness by all means. We cannot hear too much of it; but rather counsel lads to retain that by which they were at first endowed, train it, cultivate it, that when they become men, it may not depart from them. Let it become so firmly fixed in their natures that when man estate is reached they will not become business liars, and self-justified thieves. Manliness is by no means a necessary characteristic of the being who reaches his majority.

In Texas a judge has refused to naturalize an applicant who said he was a socialist and a disciple of Most. The judge gave a decision in writing that the principles of socialism were directly opposed to the Constitution of the United States, and he would not make the man a citizen. This will make a very interesting case for an appeal.

Possibly, the country, at large, may awake to a realization of the importance of this subject. A few more Chicago Anarchist riots may be necessary to teach us that they are not all men who walk erect and talk articulate speech.

Carl Hammond Nye.

That is his name and he became a resident of Worcester September 6th of this year of grace. His parents are Charles D. Nye, in the employ of Putnam, Davis & Co., and Mrs. Mabel G. (Hammond) Nye, daughter of Dr. L. H. Hammond. Mr. Nye is a graduate of the W. H. S., Class of '85 and his wife went from the school to Bradford Academy. That the family and friends are happy over the event, goes without saying and congratulations are in order.

Swedish Fair.

Our citizens of North Europe extraction are specially interested in the Fair to be held in Mechanics' Hall, the last week in this month. A Swedish Fair calls out a hearty response from our citizens, both native and foreign born.

In the Calm of Eventide.

O Eventide! 'sweet Eventide,
The hour of childlike prayer,
When hearts heavy and aching
Implore the Father's care.

O Eventide! 'sweet Eventide,
The best hour of sad and thought,
It helps repenting souls to trust
In God's protecting power.

O Eventide! 'sweet Eventide,
The sun with reverent bow,
It seems to bend the knee in prayer,
To thine approaching rays.

O Eventide! 'sweet Eventide,
When heaven to earth shines down,
The father opens wide his arms,
The child in faith draws near.

O Eventide! 'sweet Eventide,
Foretaste of heavenly rest,
It is the soul's sweet resting place,
The soul enjoys dear Eventide.

A Girl's Essay on Boys.

Boys are men that have not got as big as their papas, and girls are women that will be young ladies by and by. Man was made before women. When God looked at Adam, he said to himself, "Well, I think I can do better if I try again," and then he made Eve. God liked Eve so much better than Adam, that there have been more women than men. Boys are a trouble. They wear out everything but soap. If I had my way half the boys in the world would be girls, and the rest would be dolls. My papa is so nice that I think he must have been a little girl when he was a little boy.—St Andrew's Church Record.

Amherst.

Initiations were held at most of the fraternities last Monday evening and a number of Worcester men were present. The fraternity system at Amherst seems to be gaining strength yearly and winning the confidence of the faculty by the results achieved. Nine societies have chapters here at present, and the rivalry among them for college honors tends to the best effects on the men themselves, while the charm of life in the society houses forms one of the pleasantest features of the college course. About eighty per cent of the men in college are members of the fraternities.

At the recent Senior class elections, Charles E. Burbank was for the fourth time elected gymnasium captain of '92. His re-election is a deserved tribute to Mr. Burbank's ability as an officer.

Among the awards of prizes to the Class of '93 for the best orations of Spring term Sophomore year was one to Lewis T. Reed.

Mr. Franklin P. Rice, who for three years, has occupied rooms in the Burnside Building, will soon transfer his printing business to the new edifice of the Society of Anti-Quity. Hence he will continue to send out the books that have contributed so much to the well being of Worcester.

Cyrus L. Hutchins of Erie, Pa., the contributor of the old letter in last week's paper was a lieutenant in the 1st U. S. Volunteers, not 15th Mass., as stated.

People who have pianos to tune will do well to note the advertisement of Elwyn H. Fowler. He does good work and is a deserving man.

LIGHT for Oct. 21 will be a paper of unusual interest having a portrait and sketch of Pastor Eklund of the Thomas Street Methodist Church and portraits with sketches of all the former presidents of the Womens' Relief Corps. Also a full account of the establishment and objects of the order.

The Clinton Courant, one of the brightest of Worcester County papers and, already, a model of typographical neatness, has joined the procession of eight paged papers, losing thereby something of its familiar appearance but retaining all of Editor Parkhurst's incisiveness and vigor.

The Arrat comes to LIGHT for the first time, not the real mount but an Armenian paper bearing that name. It has four pages of five columns each. There are seven columns of English from which may be gleaned some of the hardships to which Armenia is subjected by the Turks, also some of the aspirations of the Armenians for independence. P. M. Ayvad is editor and proprietor.

The Chicago Inter Ocean of October 5th is a Grant number, setting forth the dedication of the equestrian figure of the Rebellion suppressor that Chicago has reared to his memory. The Western giant has put New York completely in the shade. Gotham is waiting for the country, at large, to erect the monument, just as she allowed the New York World to carry through the Liberty's pedestal. It was a good thing for the World. Chicago, though, can give the Empire City points on how to do many things.

In hired quarters, room is a very important item, for this reason, one of these days, LIGHT will dispose of all back numbers, so you who have not complete files had better look up the missing dates and fill them when possible. Remember that no paper contains so complete a picture of passing Worcester as does this very sheet. Its value is not exhausted in a single reading, but grows more and more valuable as the weeks go by.

The Twenty Fifth.

The Twenty-Fifth.

That regiment is fortunate that twenty-six years after the strife can form in line with the same leader at the head who led them on many a well fought field. Of the regiments that were peculiarly Worcester County in their formation, the TwentyFifth with a single exception is the only one that yet forms under the direction of him whose voice was long since heard in battle's din. General Pickett is still with his boys, but General Lincoln no longer assembles his old command, the Thirty Fourth. The Fifteenth will meet on Wednesday next, without their adored Devens. The Thirty Sixth, long since learned to reunite without the old regimental head; the Twenty First lost its identity before the war closed and only the Fifty First, of our local veteran bodies aside from the Twenty Fifth continues to respond to a war colonel's voice.

Though not the largest gathering yet held, that of Thursday was an excellent one. One hundred and sixty comrades came together in G. A. R. hall, talked over old times, discussed present and future prospects and elected the following officers for the ensuing year.

President, Josiah Pickett; Vice Presidents, E. P. Brown of South Gardner, Co. 1; Samuel H. Putnam, Co. A; Christian Class of East Hampton, Co. G; L. G. McKnight of South Gardner, Co. H; Lyman Leighton of Clinton, Co. B; Chaplain, J. E. Spaulding of Fitchburg, Co. F; Secretary and Treasurer, Claire W. Putnam of Co. K; Executive Committee, W. O. Wilder, Co. H; F. U. Gates, Co. K; W. S. Bugbee, Co. A; Christian Schlenker, Co. G; James M. Drennan, Co. F; Finance Committee, George B. Proctor of Fitchburg, Co. F; Wm. E. Murdock of Boston; Co. K; Harvey Clark of West Gardner, Co. F.

Secretary Claire W. Putnam reported the following deaths during the year past:

Co. A, Henry F. Knox, Charles Forbes of Boylston; Co. B, Willard Clark, Andrew Bagley; Co. C, O. W. Cutter; Co. D, George W. Hastings; Co. E, Patrick Leahy, Leominster; Co. F, James A. Stockwell, Richard F. Collins; Co. G, John L. Meyer; Co. H, Geo. H. Carter; Co. I, Joel Flagg; Co. K, H. B. Spooner.

Just before dinner, the comrades fell in and marched down to the City Hall, when Thomas O'Flynn, a nephew of Capt. "Tom" O'Neil, killed at Cold Harbor, photographed the veterans. Then they came back to Continental Hall, where Rebhoff had furnished one of his bestapests. General Pickett presided and with him sat Gen. A. B. R. Sprague, 51st Mass.; Gen. Wm. F. Draper of Hopedale, 36th Mass.; Chap. J. C. Spaulding; Gen. George R. Hawkes of Templeton, 21st Mass.; Chaplain C. M. Smith of the 1st Mass. cavalry, and honorary member A. S. Roe, Regimental Surgeon Dr. J. Marcus Rice, Secretary C. W. Putnam, Capt. A. H. Foss, Col. Orson Moulton, W. M. Willis and Maj. M. B. Bessey.

Grace was said by Chaplain Spaulding. After the feast was over, General Pickett began the after dinner part by some pleasing references to the past and then introduced Gen. W. F. Draper an early 25th man, but late of the 36th. The general made a feliciitous response, and after him General A. B. R. Sprague the 1st lieutenant colonel of the regiment recalled early memories of the formation of the 56th and of the battle baptism received at Roonoke. General Hawkes of the old 21st was called out. The general then announced fund of War Memories to draw from and he could talk entertainingly much longer than he did for the early association of the two regiments gave them a very brotherly feeling.

Surgeon J. Marcus Rice, as he always does, exhibited the true soldierly feeling and alluded to the fact that the general had a great deal of love was one of mercy. His care in this respect caused his capture once. Alfred S. Roe spoke of his pleasure in being an honorary of the regiment and of his experience when abroad one year ago. Comrade Leach of Warren read an interesting poem, entitled "Looking Backward" and wanted the comrades to keep an eye on Commissioner Emerson Stone. The latter responded feelingly for the late Colonel Upton and Quartermaster Brown. Then came the regimental historian, Capt. J. Waldo Denny. He spoke with feeling, according to his fellows forty more reunions. Drennan followed. Sergt. Major Samuel H. Putnam was called out and Comrade McKnight told of his meeting old foes, now friends in Alabama. Oscar Tourtelotte and George E. Potter responded while Thomas Saul of Waltham, 77 years of age, said he expected twenty-five more gatherings like this. Secretary Putnam, Corporal Bugbee and Chaplain Spaulding spoke briefly and a small boy, Luther H. Stone, a son of Captain Emerson S. was made an honorary member as was C. F. Wilson also. During the exercises Geo. F. Oakley sang several war songs, accompanied by C. W. Wilson. The meeting closed by the adoption of the following resolution, moved by Captain Stone.

"Resolved, that it is the sense of the association that the government of the United States owes to the prisoners of war who endured the horrors of Andersonville and the prisons of the south, a debt of gratitude which it can never repay, and that, in just recognition of that debt, our government should see to it that those who survived the horrors of those accursed pens should receive the most generous treatment at its hands, and that the memory of those who perished should forever be kept green."

Turkish and Russian Baths.

Thursday and Friday the new Turkish and Russian Baths at No. 1 Sudbury Street were open for public inspection. The proprietor is S. R. Jensen and the manager is his brother, N. S. Jensen, who has had a long experience in one of the finest institutions of the kind in the country, that of A. L. Wood, M. D., of Brooklyn, N. Y.

The entire building is occupied by the institution and is fitted for the giving of almost every form of bath that has been devised. In its construction great care has been taken to secure pure air, good light and ventilation. It is lighted by incandescent electric lights. The water is supplied by an artesian well.

The hours of opening for the reception of bathers as follows: Ladies, 9 a.m. to 12.30 p.m. on each week day except Wednesday, and from 2 to 9 p.m. on Wednesday. Gentlemen, 2 to 9 p.m. on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday; 9 a.m. to 12.30 p.m. on Wednesday, and Saturday from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On a 9 o'clock noon on Sunday. The Baths can take a bath Saturday evening and occupy room until Sunday morning. Miss Elin Lundberg, a lady of long experience, will take charge of the ladies' department.

In connection with the institution the manufacturer publishes a paper "The Thermæe," which gives detailed accounts of the different baths and the benefit derived from them.

Heald was chosen second assistant.

Y. P. S. C. E.

The annual meeting of the Local Union was held at Park Church Tuesday evening. On account of the storm, the attendance was much smaller than had been expected, only about one hundred being present. The program began with a Scripture reading by the president, D. B. Tucker, and prayer by John A. Sherman of the Park Church society. After singing, the reports of the numbers of the members of the different societies present were read. The Park Church society had the largest per cent of its members present and was awarded the possession of the banner until the next meeting. The recording secretary's report, which followed, stated that Union has existed four years and that during the past year twelve meetings have been held and the number of societies has increased from 21 to 29. The corresponding secretary's report showed that during the year the total membership of the societies has increased from 1145 to 1745. The treasurer's report showed that there was a small balance in the treasury.

The report of the committee to nominate officers for the coming year was read, accepted and adopted, the nominations being as follows: President, D. B. Tucker; corresponding secretary, Mrs. F. H. Sampson; treasurer, H. H. Roach. After singing again, the president introduced Rev. Webster Woodbury of Millford, who gave an interesting address on "Self Culture through Endeavor."

The next meeting of the Union will be held at the Dewey Street Baptist Church in November. The principal speaker of the evening will be the Rev. Phillip Nordell, a Baptist Clergyman from New London, Conn. He will speak on interdenominationalism.

The regular monthly meeting of the executive board of the Union will be held in Y. M. C. A. parlor, next Monday evening.

The Christian Endeavor state convention will be held at Springfield, November 17 and 18.

Last Sunday was the sixth anniversary of the 141st Church Endeavor Society. The only special observance of the anniversary was the preaching of a sermon in the evening by the pastor, Rev. C. M. Southgate, on "The ideal Christian Endeavor Society." From his earnest manner it was evident that he believed in the principles of the society and it was also evident that he had received much valuable assistance from the society in his church. He said the ideal society should be positive and pliable, full of enthusiasm and steadfastness, should have loyalty with breadth and individuality with co-operation. The Pilgrim society began six years ago with a membership of 19, which has increased until now the total membership numbers 153, of which 109 are active, 30 associate and 14 affiliated. The number added during the past year is 47. Also during last year fifteen active members have united with the church. During the six years of its existence the society has received and expended over $1000. This amount, save the very small portion necessary for the society's expenses, has been devoted to missionary purposes, both home and foreign. At present, the society is supporting a native preacher in India.

The Park Church Endeavor Society will celebrate with a supper, next Thursday evening, its fourth anniversary.

Y. M. C. A.

The educational classes will open Monday evening and the rolls of the various classes will remain open until that time. Instruction is offered in French, business arithmetic, penmanship, book-keeping, phonography, German and English grammar.

The sale of tickets for the Association course has been unusually large. The sale for the single series opened Wednesday and the sale for single nights will open next Wednesday. This is beyond all question the best course the Association has offered for several years, a fact which seems, judging from the large sale of tickets to be appreciated. The first entertainment will take place October 29 and will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club.

The gymnasium classes are larger this year than for some time. Wednesday evening, in the drill, the entire floor was covered.

Mr. W. H. Hadley of the Water Street

Mission of New York will talk to the boys tomorrow at three o'clock about the boys of New York. He will also address the men's meeting at four.

At the annual meeting Tuesday evening new directors were elected as follows: F. F. Knowles, A. S. Roe, J. F. Keyes, C. H. Carpenter, J. J. Lundberg, C. M. Rogers and D. W. Abercrombie.

The state convention will be held at Brockton, Oct. 22 to 25. The local Association will be represented by President Rugg, J. B. Hunt, J. E. Thomas, J. L. Kelley, George C. Whitney, Secretary Gale, Luther Slade, H. L. Bancroft, W. E. Lewis, George L. Sandford, C. Forrest Wesson, W. D. B. Meade.

J. G. Wooley will speak to the Association later in the month.

George F. Burr, a High school graduate, Class of 1890, is cashier in Raymond's restaurant, Washington street, Boston, near the Old South Church.

"Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks. Rage! Blow!" Sets you thinking of warmth-giving garments, doesn't it? We were never in better shape to meet your needs ---man, woman and child.

For women there are all the usual styles, in vests and drawers and combination suits, ribbed and plain as well. Children and men equipped for any degree of cold. The sorts are white merino, natural wool, blue wool, scarlet wool, colored wool, black wool, silk and wool, all silk.

Everything is here that should be. We give no heed to the numerous ephemeral underwear wonders, called "sanitary," "hygienic," "health-preserving," "medicinal." They savor too much of buncombe and quackery---with high prices.

One test for our underwear is to wash it. When "medicated" garments come to the wash-tub their uselessness is proved.

DENHOM & MCKAY UNION

American Antiquarian Society.

The 21st day of October is the reputed anniversary of America's discovery. Accordingly on that date, the above society holds its annual meetings in this city, gathering in the well known building, corner of Main and Highland streets. It is no part of this article to give a detailed history, that has been written, repeatedly, but LIGHT would briefly set before its readers a few of the interesting features of the organization and its collections. Isaiah Thomas, that staunch old patriot of the Revolution, the first man to read the Declaration of Independence in New England, was the founder of this body and gave to it his library, land for the building and money for its maintenance. Naturally, he was the first president, from 1812 to his death in 1831. A part of the old hall is still standing, the domed structure on Summer street between the Belmont corner block and the old school house. The north wing, thereof, was torn down to make room for the large block on the corner. Early in the Fifties, a demand for increased room drove the society to new and more commodious quarters which also have been added to once. Libraries that are useful grow and there is a constant stream of literature flowing into this receptacle for books. Valuable as the collection is, there are many intelligent people in this city who know little of its extent and significance. In fact, some of Worcester's visitors could tell more of what the contents are worth than many well-to-do inhabitants. From 9 a. m. to 5 p. m., save on Saturday afternoon, visitors are welcomed, except when the society meets. Annual meetings bring together a great many distinguished gentlemen. At this time, the Rev. E. E. Hale; the Rev. Dr. Ellis; Dr. Samuel A. Green, Ex-Mayor of Boston, Senator Hoar and others assemble in the main hall and listen to the reading of papers on historical subjects. The membership is not large; but it is select.

The visitor, entering the edifice, sees first the heroic figure of Moses, from Angelo's design and a full length painting of Robert B. Thomas, the famous founder of the Old Farmers' Almanac. Upon the walls are faces of men noted in American history, among others an ancestor of Colonel T. W. Higginson, the Rev. Francis H. of Salem. In a room at the left is the printing press of Isaiah Thomas, on which he printed the Messachusetts Spy.

Back of this is the room, covering nearly all the first floor, devoted to duplicates of which the library has an immense number and from which many accessions to the collection are made through exchanges. Still further on to the first floor of the new building or enlargement referred to is the room devoted to the files, in bound volumes, of newspapers. Of these there are over five thousand, a number in excess of any other collection with the possible exception of that of the Congressional Library at Washington. But this far outranks that in point of value containing as it does, sixteen volumes of the Boston News Letter, the first newspaper printed in America, beginning in 1704; seven early volumes of the New Hampshire Gazette, started in 1756, the oldest paper in this country, still extant. It has almost complete files of the Connecticut Courant established in 1764, several volumes of the Newport Mercury, 1758, and the Connecticut Gazette 1763. Of the Massachusetts Spy the sixth oldest paper in America, its list is complete. There is also a nearly complete set of Nile's Register and from the Revolutionary period down to date, there is nowhere else so perfect a picture of men and events as this room affords. The historian of today dresses up his characters as he sees or imagines them; but these newspapers show us the men as their contemporaries regarded them. What wonder, then, that the earnest student frequents this part of the building and from this almost limitless collection derives his information? It is difficult to name a paper of prominence in the eastern part of the country that cannot be found here, where every convenience is offered for consultation.

Retracing his steps to the vestibule the visitor ascends the stairs to the second story, when turning to the left he enters the office and pays his respects to the present Librarian Mr. Edmund M. Barton. He will be found and loving hands bore him tenderly to his last resting place in Mt. Auburn. Fortunately, a little more than two years before, he was prevailed upon to sit for his portrait and Custer, a Boston artist, succeeded in throwing upon canvass an almost perfect semblance of this eminent scholar and this now looks down from the walls upon the scenes of his manifold services to history. Mr. Barton, who had long been Mr. Haven's assistant and who is now in control of the collection, is Worcester born and bred, a son of the late Judge Ira M. Barton. From his many years of acquaintance, he knows his books perfectly and it is amazing with what ease he finds any book that the library possesses.

In a case in this room are about sixty books from the celebrated bindery of Bedford, the most of them from the famous Brinley collection to which the Society felt heir to the extent of five thousand dollars. Probably no collection of books, by the Mathers, is so complete as this, each little book in its uniqueness and splendor of binding representing almost a fortune and making the mouth of the genial and ready to talk about the treasures under his care; but those of us who have visited this room in years that are gone, will instinctively look over that great desk, with its revolving top, which once stood in the middle of the room, for that venerable form which for so many years sat behind it and from his chair gave kindly greeting to all seeking his counsel and advice; and they were many who came asking information from Samuel Foster Haven, for nearly fifty years the Librarian. Should we pause to tell all the good qualities of this gentleman we should write nothing more, for his virtues were legion, his accomplishments many, and his kindness limitless. The obligations that many were under for assistance can, perhaps, be expressed in no better manner than in quoting from Palfrey's Preface to his "History of New England" when he says, "To no one am I indebted for more light than to that eminent archaeologist, Samuel Foster Haven of Worcester." In September, 1887, he ceased from his labors and connoisseur water with envy and admiration.

In an ante room, adjoining, are found the publications and proceedings of the Society and it speaks volumes for the worth of the organization, to learn that few books are more highly prized than some of the early numbers of its own proceedings. Many a man reckons himself fortunate in having a complete set of them and many more are in despair, almost, at their inability to perfect their list.

Returning to the Office, where a tall clock, once in John Hancock's House, chimes out the quarter hours, we pass thence to the main room of the building where the annual meetings of the society are held and around whose sides are arranged alcoves extending in two tiers to the ceiling. In each of these alcoves, at the top are hung fine oil paintings of men conspicuous in the state and nation as of John Davis, John Winthrop, Stephen Salisbury and many others. In glass cases, on either side of the entrance to this room are preserved many of the choicest treasures of the collection.

such as the Cranmer Bible; a Missal on Velum, date 1304, most beautifully illuminated; two black letter Bibles of 1476 and 1478 respectively; a Koran elegantly executed in manuscript; an MS. on Papyrus, similar to one in the British Museum; a copy of Herodotus from the press of Peter de Maximus at Rome 1475, the oldest printed book in the collection; three of the original stamps which stirred up the trouble between this country and Mother England, and an Alta Californian printed on satin in gold letters in 1851. There is beside a mug or pitcher once in the possession of the Winthrops, so famous in early colonial history. This is accompanied by a paper written as follows in 1667 by the hand of Adam Winthrop "at ye feaste of St. Michael An 1667 my Sister ye Lady Mildmay did give me a stone pott tipped and covered with a silver Lydd."

In a safe, to prevent loss by fire or theft, are a copy of the John Eliot Bible in the Indian language (the library has two others not so perfect) printed in 1663 at Cambridge, and a Bay Psalm book, so precious that the one in Dr. Shurtleff's collection brought $1,025 at delvers among books that Worcester boasts. He has written much on matters pertaining to local history. Among those constituting the council are the following names well known here: Rev. Edward E. Hale, Judge P. Emory Aldrich, Librarian Samuel S. Green, Charles A. Chase, Hon. Edward L. Davis, Postmaster J. Everts Greene. The auditors are William A. Smith, Secretary of the Mechanics' Association and Colonel A. George Bullock.

The man interested in the history of his native town comes here for facts. At this table an aged man read diligently for eight years. Some day, a book will come from his searching. Our late Chief Justice Horace Gray, now of the United States Supreme Bench, is a member of the society and one might almost think that a liking for antiquarian research were a requisite for judicial honors. A U. S. Senator is one of the vice presidents and is often seen here looking up the pedigree of his colleagues. Here, too, is a schoolmaster who thinks a little delving in the musty past may relieve the tedium of the present. An ex-clergyman is declaring that he never supposed and inspiration. Mr. Harton and his assistant Miss Mary Robinson, are only too ready to place every convenience at the disposal of the seeker. Much of the prosperity of the society is owing to the constant care and aid of its late president, Mr. Stephen Salisbury, senior, himself a son of one of the early citizens of Worcester, he spared no effort to place the society on a sure and firm foundation. The addition to the building came solely through his generosity. The rapidly filling shelves will soon reach the limit of the building's capacity viz., about 20,000 more volumes. What will be done then? There is little doubt but that some means will be found to continue the usefulness of this vast treasure house of American History. A. S. R.

Roses.

"The Last Rose of Summer" has long been the theme of poets and who that ever heard Parepa Rosa sing the almost inspired words can forget the melody; but what shall be said of a whole bouquet of roses in October? This is the time of ashen skies and flurries of snow; but a most lovely collection of tea roses, with sweet peas and pansies was brought to LIGHT's office just one week ago. They grew under the care of Mrs. M. C. Thayer, President of the First W. C. T. U. and to her, LIGHT hereby returns thanks, hoping that her reward for services in humanity's behalf may be as beautiful and fragrant as these flowers plucked by her industrious hand.

BOOKS AND BOOKMEN.

WORCESTER, MASS., OCT. 10, 1891.

Editor of Light:

Dear Sir,—Noticing the letter of J. E. L. in your issue of the 3rd inst. relative to the poem "What is his creed," which you had reprinted from E. P. Powell's "Liberty and Life," we wrote at once to Mr. Powell to learn its authorship.

He answers: "I picked up the poem or a part of it in a newspaper scrap—certainly never intended to claim it as mine—nor could I find who wrote it; but liked it and used it. Hope the author does not imagine I ever sought to claim it."

We trust you will publish this in justice to Mr. Powell, and we hope that some of your readers may locate the author.

Yours very truly,
CHARLES H. KERR & CO.

HOME-COMING.

We had traveled over water,
We had traveled over land,
We had tarried 'neath the mountains,
We had tarried on the sand
But of all our happy roaming
The most joyful was home-coming.

O'er time's water we have journeyed,
Trodden time-lands many years,
'Mong Howe's mountains we have lingered,
And on slopes wave-swept by fairs,
But of all our life-long roaming
Will most joyful be heaven-coming.

ANTIQUARIAN HALL.

action in Boston and whose sale the Old South church tried to prevent by legal injunction.

The list of wonders might be extended much further to include the Caxton Memorial Bible, published in 1878 at the Caxton celebration in London. There were but one hundred published; but all the work of printing and binding was done in twelve hours. There are several others in this country.

As has been already stated, here gathers the society on October 21st. The President, Stephen Salisbury will preside. His father long held the office and was an unflinching friend of antiquarian research. His son inherits all of his father's zeal. The first Vice Pres., George Bancroft has passed away since the last meeting, but the second Vice Pres., the Hon. George T. Hoar, will surely be present. The Recording Secretary, Hon. John D. Washburn is in Switzerland. Nathaniel Paine, the Treasurer, has long held the office, and is, himself, one of the most indefatigable there had been so much written on genealogical subjects. Just up one flight of stairs may be seen a young man who, for several weeks, has been studying old almanacs. Who can tell what will come of it? Another man wishes to find out all about fences and he ransacks the whole library for information and finds it and so the list might be indefinitely extended. All seek information and nearly all find it.

The Library contains about 90,000 volumes. These are covered by subject and every day some delver in the realm of archaeology, local history, or genealogy may be seen hard at work. The advantages which this collection has conferred on the historical student are incalculable. Mrs. Richardson sought here material for her history of the United States as did also Bancroft, Hildreth and Gay. Palfrey was a frequenter of these halls and, in fine, it would be difficult to name any considerable work on American history whose author has not here sought aid

REPUBLICAN MEETING

—: IN :—

SKATING RINK, under the auspices of YOUNG MEN'S REPUBLICAN CAMPAIGN CLUB,

Saturday Evening, Oct. 17, 1891.

HON. * THOMAS * B. * REED, *

Ex-Speaker of National House of Representatives, will address the Republicans of Worcester.

West Gallery reserved for ladies and their escorts. Meeting at 8 o'clock. Doors open at 7 o'clock. Worcester Brass Band will furnish music.

Per Order, Executive Committee of YOUNG MEN'S CAMPAIGN CLUB.

Entertainments.

Mr. E. N. Anderson is to continue the good work which he began last Winter, in spite of the fact that those two ventures brought financial loss to him. It will be remembered that, last January, he conducted a performance at Central Church of Handel's "Messiah." The church was crowded to its utmost limit and the receipts were a trifle in excess of the expenses. In the afternoon and evening of May 22, he conducted two concerts in Mechanics Hall which will remain for a long time in the memory of those who attended. The price of the tickets for these concerts was placed so low that, though in the evening the hall was filled, the receipts were considerably over one hundred dollars less than the expenses. But Mr. Anderson was satisfied because he had accomplished the object he had desired, that is he had given Worcester people an opportunity for hearing standard music for a price of admission which all could afford.

To continue his plans begun last year, Mr. Anderson has had under consideration for some time a Christmas festival of oratorio music. Last Monday he decided to undertake it and signed a contract for the orchestra. The festival will be held in Central Church Dec. 31 and Jan. 1. The program, as now arranged, is as follows: Thursday afternoon, public rehearsal of the "Messiah," with soloists, chorus and orchestra; Thursday evening, the performance of the "Messiah"; Friday afternoon, miscellaneous concert, including Guilman's new fantasia for orchestra, organ and two harps, a piece brought from Europe this Fall by Mr. Anderson, McKenzie's "Benedictus," for orchestra and several appropriate vocal and orchestral selections; Friday evening, Mendelssohn's oratorio, "Christus," and parts of Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

The chorus will consist of one hundred voices, as far as possible the same as those in that of last May; the soloists will be local singers and the orchestra will consist of thirty-two pieces from Boston.

Mr. Anderson's object in arranging this festival is the same as it was last year and consequently the tickets for single concerts will be sold for twenty-five cents and season tickets will cost one dollar. As the expenses will be about eight hundred dollars and as Central Church seats about nine hundred people, it will be very readily seen that nearly every seat must be sold for every concert in order to meet the expenses. For his labor Mr. Anderson will get nothing, save the hearty thanks which all who attend will be sure to give him and with which he seems to be satisfied.

Amos A. Parker.

The rooth birthday of this distinguished resident of Fitzwilliam was observed, on the 8th inst, though not quite as his fellow citizens had intended. A public meeting in the town hall had been contemplated but a fall from a chair in which he had been standing, trying to suspend a picture, had so bruised him that home was thought to be the best place for him. So a quiet day was passed by his own fireside rather than in public. He is bright and cheerful notwithstanding the fall.

Postmaster John S. Fay and wife of Marlboro were in the city Thursday stopping over for a day with Major F. G. Stiles. They are taking a carriage trip to Brookfield. He is a veteran of the Thirtieth regiment and lost his right arm and leg by a shell while before Fredericksburg guarding the pontoon bridge. A fragment of shell struck the Captain and Second Lieutenant killing them both, then struck Fay shattering his arm and leg, and then passed on killing a man in a Pennsylvania regiment lying further off. A sergeant lying near Fay had laid his gun down for a moment and the shell struck it and bent the barrel like a hoop. His post office papers were made out and signed by Lincoln, but were given him by Andrew Johnson. They visited the Society of Daughters of Rebecca, Queen Esther lodge Thursday evening.

Cutting—Hall.

Elmer G. Cutting was married, Wednesday evening to Miss Katie T. Hall. The groom is bookkeeper at the Morgan Spring Works and the bride has been milliner at Barnard, Summer & Co's. Their home will be at No. 99 Green Lane.

To all parties of the city of Worcester raising one or more acres of corn, I make this announcement.

That competitors for the ten premiums on corn which I offered last spring may bring in their string of thirty ears, to Horticultural Hall, any time after Monday morning, Oct 19. Thursday, Oct. 22, the judges, O. B. Hadwin, C. L. Hartshorn and one other person will award the premiums. Please register by numbers.

Our Schools.

CHAPTER VI.

The Teachers.

In the series of articles on "Our Schools" published last year I took occasion to say of "the long list of teachers, who for one hundred and sixty-four years had always given grace and dignity to the profession and had contributed, more than any other cause to establishing the past reputation of our schools," that "this eulogium was never more merited than it is today, especially in the higher grades;" and it may equally apply to a considerable proportion of the other grades, notwithstanding the favoritism that has in too many cases influenced their appointment.

But the evil results of this favoritism are still so apparent as to call loudly for reform.

It is this favoritism and this pedantry in high position that have so long kept the schools in a routine of studies whose chief effect has been to retard the progress of education. The truth of this statement is proved every day by the experience of visitants to the schools, but we have only room for a single instance. A former graduate writes as follows:

"My experience in a late visit to a grade school will show in a slight measure the methods that are now employed in squeezing all the interest out of school work and thus making it a dry and monotonous routine of distasteful and laborious tasks. The first class in this school was being taught the art of penmanship. Each scholar had on his desk a copy book which contained various names and maxims, all written in the scrupulously correct, clear and ugly, writing-master style.

"It was the duty of each scholar to copy as exactly as he could these words and maxims: every one was compelled to adopt the method of holding the pen which the teacher directed; the teacher—not realizing that no two human beings have exactly the same handwriting, and no two human beings set about writing their signatures in the same way—was probably thinking she was conferring a blessing on the scholars by reducing their writing to a characterless monotony. But her afternoon quiet was rudely disturbed; the class had come to the word Nenophon, the meaning of which no one in the room knew; but one aggressive little fellow, (a veritable Oliver Twist, who was always asking for more information than the fountain head of knowledge could or would supply.) this little fellow presumed to come up to the desk of the school mistress and say, pointing to the word Nenophon, "Teacher what does that mean?" The respectable and almost venerable school marm was astounded, for twenty years she had plodded through that copy book without finding any interesting facts that might be connected with the names and maxims contained therein, such a question had never been asked before. Her grade was one of the highest in the school system, and the average school boy, when he reached her room, had had all originality and all desire for learning anything effectually ground out of him. This boy, however, was new to the public schools and he persisted in his audacious attempt to learn a new fact and so he repeated the question, "Teacher what does that word mean." The teacher collected her scattered wits and tried to answer him. Before her mind there floated vague ideas. There were the telephone and the phone-ophons, would the Nenophon be a new instrument invented by Edison? No, she thought not. Suddenly she remembered hearing the name of Nenophon in connection with some battle or other great historical event, (she may even have heard of the Anabasis, but had long forgotten what it was,) and so beaming kindly on the boy, she gave this instructive and encouraging answer, "my child, Nenophon is the name of a person?"

"Ex pede Herculeum," it is needless to multiply instances of the perfunctory, heartless and hopeless routine of our present school methods; heartless because hopeless and hopeless because no thorough reform can be looked for under the present régime. H. H. C.

ABOUT FOLKS.

The Lakeside Boat Club is now in its Winter quarters in the Burnside Building.

To Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Hedden was born, October 6th, a promising baby, already named Ruth Gertrude. Mrs. Hedden was Eva G. Nelson, W. H. S. class of 1883

In the award of Sophomore Scholarship at Harvard, the names of R. K. Shaw and H. C. Lakin, from this city, appear.

Principal Chapin of the Fitchburg High School gave LIGHT a brief call, last Saturday. The northern part of the county seems to agree with him.

Harry N. Rice, who was graduated at Harvard in June last, took, during his Senior year, the first year's work in the Law School, and has just passed successfully the examinations. He is now abreast of the young men who were in the class of 1890.

Mr. Charles W. Linnell, for some time connected with this paper but who is now a clerk in the pension office, Washington, has been spending his vacation in this city. His wife is a daughter of Mr. Henry Palmer of William Street. He returned to Washington early this week.

Mrs. James Early.

The funeral of this estimable lady, who died the 9th, inst., took place Monday, at 10 a.m., in St. John's Church, Rev. Mgr. Griffin officiating. The burial was in St. John's cemetery. Mrs. Early as Mary Ann Kean was a graduate of the High and Normal Schools, of the latter in 1877, and had been a teacher in our public schools. She leaves a wide circle of mourning friends.

A Lament.

Oh, I'll be old and pale,
Lying so silent there,
With roses sweet and frail,
Scattered mid locks of hair,
Hearest thou the bitter wail
Of my despair!

I lay my brow to thine,
Rain kisses on thy cheek,
Yet doth no voice or sign,
My yearning spirit reach,
Oh, can't thou not divine
My anguish, sweet!

Alas, thou wilt not wale,
Though morn is on the hills,
And the glad sunlight breaks
O'er tree and flower, and rill,
Each bird its nest forsakes,
But thou, so still.

Yonder thy little bed,
And close beside the chair
On which thy bright young head
Bow'd down to whisper prayer,
Ah me, the hour I dread,
And thou not there.

Life, oh the weary thing
It will be, missing thee,
It unto me it bring
No angel ministry
From the bright land afar
Where thou art as a star.

—Cousin Constance

Worcester, Sept. 10.

The Misses Burnside have recently given fifty-four books to the Sunday School library of the Royalton, Vermont, Congregational church. They are all standard works of the highest order, and are given for a memorial to Miss Nellie M. Stearns, whose father is proprietor of the Cascadac House in that town.

A house full of friends greeted Major Geo. F. Thompson and wife, Thursday evening, the 8th inst. It was the 40th anniversary of their marriage and also, Mrs. T.'s birthday. Merry making was in order till a late hour.

Mr. Wiley S. Thompson, a clerk in the War Department, Washington, D. C., is spending his vacation with his parents, Major and Mrs. Geo. F. Thompson, 76 Agricultural Street.

Mr. Edgar R. Howe who, for many years, was with M. D. Gilman, is now living in North Vernon, Ind. in the interests of the Non Secret Endowment Order.

Miss Eva L. Truscott, formerly of the High School, State Normal School '91, is teaching in Ashby. Next term, she may teach in the High School of that town.

Out of the Dust.

A certain Worcester small boy had a birthday. He had presents, among them, a small trunk. He was happy; but he discovered that his aunt had a trunk in the house also. His curiosity was aroused. "How does it happen, Aunt, that you have a trunk here?" "Oh, I used to live here. I was here before you were born." "Is that so? I wonder where I was then? I guess I must have been floating up and down the street." This aroused Aunt's curiosity and she says, "How was that?" "Oh, don't you know that I am made out of the dust. I suppose I was dust on this street and that is the reason, I happened to float into this house."

Books and Bookmen.

Recalled to Life by Grant Allen. Henry Holt & Co., New York, Leisure Moment Series, 40 cents.

Ever since Hugh Conway wrote "Called Back" we have been having a series of stories in which an entranced state is an important feature. The title suggests just the condition of affairs that follows. At eighteen years of age a terrible shock produces absolute oblivion of the past, only a terrible, bloody picture for a background. But Mr. Allen is a master of plot and detail. He never minds distance when he writes and so, in this story, gives us England, Australia and Canada; but they are introduced naturally, not dragged in. But how the novel of the day introduces features that were not dreamed of in Sir Walter's day. Even Dickens had no use for a bicycle and an instantaneous photograph apparatus. Of course, the adept in photography might wonder how the plates could be taken from the camera, in the light, without destroying them; but it will not do to examine a short story too closely. The heroine sets out to find a murderer. She finds him or rather her she traces the slayer down to herself. Not even Major Winthrop's Cecil Dreeme was a neater bit of plot than this. The psychological features of the story are well wrought out and while we may not find the tale so thrilling as Bred in the Bone yet it is what the publishers put it forth for, an excellent diversion for leisure moments.

If there was anything of importance left out of the October number of the Inland Printer, it is not apparent at the first glance, for it would seem that everything talked about and discussed in a printing office were here given full display. This is No. 1 of Vol. IX and crowded as it is with advertisements, it must be a grand success. The frontispiece, Mark Twain's face, is a fine sample of the engraver's art, worthy to rank with Albert Durer's, and the Evangeline, though different from the familiar form that "sometimes in church yards strayed," is beautiful. The more one regards it, the more attractive it becomes. In every way the number is a tribute to the taste and enterprise of Chicago. Published by the Inland Printing Company at $2 per year.

Wide Awake. F. F. Cloth, $2. Boston, D. Lothrop Company.

A new volume of Wide Awake means always expectation in its announcement, enjoyment in its monthly realization, and a full feast when the bound volume appears. Such a feast—full and satisfactory—is offered in the new volume just issued in the warm and cheerful red covers that so many young people have learned to welcome and enjoy. The change in type made in the magazine at the beginning of the year makes an especially attractive page when seen in bulk between covers. But new type and crimson covers are not everything. The feast of good things spread in this new volume is attractive and appetizing. Here are names well-known in every home in the land. The famous Pepper family, with whom Margaret Sidney has made us all acquainted, are here again met with in her entertaining serial, "The Five Little Peppers Grown Up," and Kirk Munroe, one of the editors of Harper's Young People, has a capital railroad serial, "Cab and Caboose," that is both realistic and dramatic. Amanda I. Harris and Sarah Pratt McLean, Mrs. Elizabeth Harrison and Mary E. Wilkins, Elzabeth Robins Pennell and Frances A. Humphrey, Graham R. Tomson and Katherine S. Macquoid, Emilie Poulsson and Katherine B. Foote and Susan Coolidge, Governor John D. Long and Elbridge S. Brooks, Oscar Fay Adams and Henry Kirk White, Dr. Alexander H. Japp and Henry Baker, Ernest Ingersoll and Grant Allen and Lieutenant Frémont are but a few of the names attached to story, sketch, and verse to which such illustrative artists as Taylor and Hassam and Bridgman and Bacon and Pennell and Barnes have added pictures. The volume is crowded with good reading from cover to cover, not too many continued stories, and the short ones sparkling, bright and entertaining. A series of studies in figure drawing by Caroline Hunt Rimmer is full of interest and practical suggestions for any child who likes to use the pencil.

Our Little Men and Women for 1891. Cloth, $1.75; boards, $1.25. Boston, D. Lothrop Company.

No prettier or more attractive annual for younger readers exists than the yearly (bound) volume of Our Little Men and Women. It is always bright and cheery, always healthful and helpful, always charming in its material and fascinating in its pictures. The volume for 1891 is no exception to this rule. It is beautifully printed and bound, and the stories and poems of which it is made up are such as every little man and woman welcomes with enthusiasm and enjoys with unalloyed pleasure. Mrs. Archibald's story of a lovely but very human baby girl "Lady Gay," and Jennie Stealey's story of two bright little New Mexican boys, "The Little Freighter," are such as all children love to hear, and are but samples of the good things in this new volume, whose bright and attractive covers will draw many eager young eyes to investigate and feast upon the brighter things they enclose.

The Un'iscovered Country, a novel by William D. Howells, Riverside Paper Series. 30 cents. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

In this striking novel Mr. Howells treats spiritualism with great skill and fairness; he describes life among the Shakers very charmingly; and tells an engaging love story. The New York Evening Post pronounced it "a novel of unusual power," and added, that "as a drama of life and passion the story has a measure of power which belongs to very few novels of our time." It is fortunate that a story of so great interest is brought out in a form and at a price which should give it a very wide reading.

Scientific American, Architects and Builders Edition, for October.

If people do not have beautiful and pleasant homes it will not be because the publishers of this monthly have not done their best to picture them. Every page contains the semblance in which happiness might be found, a thing to live for, to work for. The majority of the engravings are of moderate cost houses.

Ingalis' Home and Art Magazine for October is at hand, and already the hints for Christmas are appearing in its pages. An article on All-hallowe will be of use to many in preparing for small gatherings to celebrate the night. A fine paper on "Arts and Artists," and the criticisms asked for by the readers fill several pages. There are hints on china painting, and also wood carving. The frontispiece is a beautiful study of morning glories. We wish it might have been given in colors though the palette for painting it is carefully given. Price of the magazine is $1 per year.

Educational Review, edited by Nicholas Murray Butler, Ph. D., October, 1891, Henry Holt & Co., New York. $3 a year.

This magazine is a welcome visitor and starts off the new school year in excellent form. The leading articles are "The Place of Schools of Technology in American Education" by Pres. Francis A. Walker of Boston; "American Pioneers of University Extension," by Herbert B. Adams; "Impression of German Schools," by John T. Prince and "Education in the Eleventh Census Year," by James H. Blodgett. It would be invidious to discriminate in regard to these articles. All are worth careful study. It is comforting to find that Mr. Prince thinks our American schools not without merit. University Extension is a theme occupying much time and attention now at home and abroad. The Reviews of educational works and the Resumes of Foreign matters are more extended than those given by any other American Educational publication.

Education, a monthly magazine of science, art, philosophy and literature of education, Frank H. Kason, editor, 50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass. $3 a year.

Dr. Unton continues his series on "Moral Education" and Elizabeth Porter Good considers "The Woman Problem." "European Learning in Japan" is particularly interesting, by Wm. C. Kitchen; then we are taken to New Zealand for "Primary Education." Z. Richards writes of "Teaching, Learning, Instructing and Educating." "Mediaeval England" as seen in her ballads by Laura Sanderson Hines, A. M., is particularly interesting. Doubtless, it will grace many a recitation in English Literature. "Manual Training for the Schools of Boston" by Samuel E. Capen is a timely setting forth of the most pertinent matter now agitating the educational world.

Diana of the Crossways, by George Meredith. Rand, McNally & Co., publishers, Chicago.

The heroine is an Irish girl, beautiful, witty, and independent. She commits the error of marrying for a home, and after obtaining a home, her independence leads her to commit other errors, and in consequence of these she incurs the distrust of her husband and a separation is the result. One true heart clings to her in spite of all and her friend Emma advises, cautions and saves her from the tongue of the world by speaking for her on all occasions. Diana tried to earn her way by writing, but failing, at the last she sells the secret, told her by Mr. Daer, to an editor, and as a result he, angered by her deception, goes back to his old love and Diana tries her best to die. Just in time Emma, Lady Dunstane, comes in to save her. Doubtless the book ends too suddenly. It is a good showing of the impulsive nature of the Irish race, and also brings in London society.

The Cosmopolitan for October, Cosmopolitan Publishing Co., New York.

For many years The Century, Harper's Monthly, and Scribner's have held almost without rivals, the leadership among the American monthly publications. But a few years ago a new contestant entered the lists, began to draw upon the leaders, who, judging from present appearances, will now be obliged to struggle hard to retain their lead. This new factor in the contest is the Cosmopolitan. In one point at east, that of excellence and number of illustrations, it has already not only got abreast of the leaders but is slightly in the advance. Its literary merit it is so near to the older magazines that only the sharpest eye can detect the slightest difference. As a sample of what this magazine offers its readers each month he current number may well be taken. The titles of the articles show a wide diversity in subject and the names signed to the articles are very frequently those of men who have a "wide reputation as an authority on the subject on which they write." "Three Women of the Comédie Française" by Elsie Anderson de Wolfe is given the first place in this number. "Some Great Storms," by William A. Edly will be interesting reading to many. It is, like all the other articles, superbly illustrated. Osman Bey, who is a young Turkish gentleman of high rank and who has been educated in the United States, writes entertainingly and instructively of the "Modern Women of Turkey." Those who like Mr. Edly's article will probably turn next to John Bunker's article on "The New Desert Lake." Muat Halstead's sketch of Cincinnati is not dry, as might be expected, but it holds the interest to the end. His Review of Current Events is missed from this number and to many it is a serious omission. It is hoped that this department is not permanently dropped. "Lady Clare" is the story of a horse, by the well-known novelist, Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen. Jenny L. Hopkins writes about "An Oyster Village" and Harry L. Wells tells of "The Massacre of the Peace Commissioners." The last installment of Amélie Rives' new novel "According to St. John" is also found in this number. Edward Everett Hale takes, this time, "Gambling" for his subject, in his series on Social Problems and Brander Matthews in his regular contribution writes on "Certain Recent Foreign Fiction." The poetry is as follows: "In the Ruin of a Thunderstorm," Louise I. Guiney; "My Ideal," Laurence Maynard; "Las Caritas de Calamidad," Ella L. Dorsey; "Superstition," E. F. Ware; "The Violet Bank," Clinton Scollard.

The address of Librarian Samuel S. Green before the American Library Association in San Francisco the 13th, inst., is a highly interesting and valuable document and LIGHT regrets its inability to reproduce it in full. There never was a better review of the growth and development of our present system of library care and usefulness than Mr. Green presents. (One portion of the address, particularly pertinent to Worcester people is the description he gives of the recent exhibitions of pictures in the upper rooms of the library. Mr. Green has long been an innovator in matters pertaining to books and has, thereby, succeeded in placing his name among the very first librarians in the country. Not only in America, but in Europe as well, he has a distinguished reputation.

The House of Martha, by Frank R. Stockton. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. $1.25.

The readers of the Atlantic have already had this story as a serial in the Atlantic Monthly. Doubtless many have waited till its appearance in book form that they may take it in short order, rather than have the delayed reading from month to month. Stockton has the merit of originality, though his under-study suggests Edward Everett Hale's "My Double and how he undid me." As in fairy stories, Mr. Stockton has no difficulty with the novel when once he is granted a start. He does not travel so far with his characters as do some authors; but he does keep them exceedingly busy. The House of Martha is a sort of Protestant nunnery, whose inmates take vows of celibacy and go about trying to alleviate the woes of humanity. The hero of the story needs an amanuensis and secures one from the House in the shape of a gray dressed and scoop-bonneted individual, Sister Hagar, by name. She does not like the name no more than does the hero and they agree to fall back on her original name, Sylvia. Of course, there are lots of obstructions in the way of true love. To begin with, they have to talk to each other, with a grated door between them, and, till a wandering wasp came in at an open window, Mr. Vanderley had no idea how beautiful a being his scribe was. Women cannot abide mice and winged creatures, so Sylvia, nun or not, has to jump about, doffs her bonnet and finally kills the intruder.

The hero, after her departure, takes the insect and preserves it most carefully. Finally, it is anxiety to keep this souvenir by him that delays his departure for Europe long enough to let him receive a message from Sylvia's mother, who sends for him to come to her at once. He goes, and learns that the House of Martha is dissolved, that vows are cancelled and Sylvia may be his.

The closing scenes give a tender picture of felicity and happiness to come. Mr. Walkirk, who has been the second self in the story, the under-study does not undo his principal as did the character in Mr. Hale's narrative; but he is constant to the end. In fact, there are no plotters in "The House of Martha." All are excellent people and the reader will close the book with a feeling of great satisfaction. Virtue and constancy are rewarded and there is no wrong doing to punish. The stamp of fresh, airy, delightful life pervades every page. For sale by the Denholm & McKay Company, Boston Store.

Plays and Players.

Our old friend Effie H. Ober, former manager of the Boston Ideals is happily married to V. P. Kline, a Cleveland lawyer. Mrs. Kline is the best stepmother in Cleveland. So say the three children of Mr. Kline.

Anna Katherine Green has dramatized her novel "The Leavenworth Case," and it is making a big hit in Chicago. Mrs. Green is thinking of devoting all her literary energies to the drama after this.

Denman Thompson played to a $5,170 house Labor Day in Boston. This breaks all records for one day's performance in that city, the highest previous amount taken in that time being $4,700.

Elsie Anderson De Wolfe, New York's fashionable amateur actress, made her professional debut in that city last week, in Sardou's latest and greatest play, "Thermidor." The piece scored an unqualified hit, but the actress was severely handled by the critics.

There is rumor that Edwin Booth is breaking up. He was found recently by a newspaper man wandering aimlessly around Boston, being unable to find his way from one street to another.

Manager Alf. Hayman has been having trouble in securing a satisfactory servant girl. The first girl would only give him one night out in a week, and as he has to be at the theatre every night, she discharged him. Then John Russell suggested that he keep on the look-out for stranded farce comedy companies and engage a soubrette. He did so, and he found one—a blonde, "I had to let her go though," he sighed, yesterday. "She did nothing but dust the furniture. You know how soubrettes dust furniture on the stage, why, she dusted all the varnish off our piano in three days. Last Thursday I was down in the flat writing up some press notices, she was unaware of my presence. Pretty soon she stopped dusting and said: 'Ah, there is no one here. I just have time to try that little song and-dance I learned last night.' Then she started in on 'Maggie Murphy's Home.' I interrupted her with two weeks' notice and she took one. She goes with "A Spool of Thread" by the author of A Rubber Band and Ball of Twine. I am now in correspondence with brother Bolony Kiralfy in an effort to draw on his back row."

One day it was raining hard when Mrs. Lease boarded a street-car. The car was chuck full, and all the men on the seats sat closer back and evinced a determination to keep a position of sedentary comfort. Mrs. Lease cast her eye down the car, and, at the same time, a man in the corner started to rise. "Don't," said the man next to him, grasping his arm: "that's Mrs. Lease. Don't you know her? She believes in equality of both sexes. Woman suffrage, you know." The stooped man smiled and got up. "Come," said the speaker, still more importunate, "you're not going to get up, are you? If she thinks she's equal to a man, let her stand. Give her a dose of her own medicine." But Mrs. Lease had taken the man's seat, greatly to the discomfiture of the other, who wanted to see her stand. Next day he met the stranger on the street. "Hello," he said, "you're the man that gave you your seat to Mrs. Lease. You missed a good chance to take her down a little. There wasn't another man in the car that would have given you. Wasn't impolite, you know. Just a little joke. What made you get up? Did she hypnotize you?" "See here," said the man addressed, "I guess you don't know me." "Can't say that I do. Who are you?" "I'm Mr. Lease."

The Corbin Deer Park.

The following is from the pen of Hon. Charles R. Corning, of Concord, who, with a party from Pine Cliff, paid a visit to the park on Thursday last:—

"Six miles straight over the hills from Newport village are the outlying confines of the famous deer park of Austin Corbin. It is only a few years old, yet its name is known all over the country. Surely so remarkable an enterprise deserves an unlimited notoriety, for nowhere under the sun is such an extraordinary collection of animals to be seen. The energy and determination of Austin Corbin are shown as forcibly in his deer park as in his various railroad and steamship projects. Who but he would have undertaken the labor of getting together such herds of buffalo, deer, elk and boars? Unlike the late Mr. Barium, the menagerie element does not figure in his plans; his beasts are of genus Americanus—all, I believe, save the Austrian boars. To give anything like a clear description of the features of this immense territory is impossible, but those persons familiar with New Hampshire topography will easily make a rough picture for themselves of more than thirty thousand acres of mountains and valleys, rocks, ledges, undergrowth and forest, ponds, streams, brooks, hummocks, fens, and bogs, with scarcely a spot anywhere in the purchase level enough to make a tennis court. Into four townships does the park extend—Newport, Croydon, Cornish and Grantham all contribute their ugliest and wildest acres to gratify the insatiable ambition of the man who was born among these unpromising rocks, and who forty years ago went out in the world to seek and to gain its golden smiles.

What Mr. Corbin has in mind regarding so magnificent a domain does not appear, but he is doing his work with a system that promises good results. I have it from good authority that the cost of this empire of the wilderness is fast climbing toward $300,000, but the lord of the manor keeps cheerfully planning for future aggrandizement, and scarcely a week goes by without carrying with it a car load of new animals bound for the park.

This vast tract of hills and rocks is entirely enclosed with strong wire fence, ten feet high, and thirty miles long, with posts some fifteen feet apart, costing the snug sum $1,500 a mile, and to enclose it has reeled off about 500 miles. The cost of capturing and shipping the animals has been enormous, the buffaloes alone costing nearly a thousand dollars a head. It is a strange notion or tad for a man to buy so many miles of rugged land and so many million tons of rocks and quarries, and turn in upon them scores of wild animals. But this is what Mr. Corbin has done and what he is doing.

He has done with the bought-out farms of Croydon and Grantham as the Poors did with Star Island at the Shoals. He has bought the people, bag and bedding, and given good sums for the homesteads. Considering the nature of the animals abounding thereabouts, a speedy removal on the part of the vendors became a necessity attaching to which is none of the sentimentalism of Evangeline and the Arcadian farmers. A few houses are occupied by game-keepers, for the animals need watching, but the larger number are deserted.

To this terrestrial Noah's ark the people of Pine Cliff, by invitation of Mr. Willard D. Emery of Boston, journeyed a few days ago, going to Newport by cars, thence to the Park by carriages. The way is rough and ascending and it was this that made the unfolding scenery to the north and east, disclosing the blue and irregular mountains, linger longer. On the height near the gamekeeper's house the expanse of view is generous and it is from this point that one gets some idea of the extent of Mr. Corbin's domain. Far away and over the hills is the park; across wide valleys and over granite-cropped mountain is the home of the buffalo and deer. No wonder that with so vast a grazing ground the animals keep out of sight. Our party was surely in luck for the buffaloes were considerate enough to be sunning their shaggy heads in an angle of the fence near the highway. Nineteen big, burly bison, more than in all Dakota, lazily rolled their eyes and swayed their huge heads in true prairie style. Only a week ago an infuriated bull buffalo made things lively to encroaching guests, but when I peered through the meshes of the wire fence my surprise was great to behold a man calmly gathering apples while around him were two scores of wild beasts. He had a complete understanding with the animals and when his task was done he placed his ladder against the fence and came out into the world. It frequently happens that people get no sight at the animals and go away disappointed, but in our case they were on dress parade and afforded us every facility of watching them.

Near sunset, they say, the buffaloes and deer come into the field near the farm house, but their habits in this respect are not constant and there are periods of days at a time when only one or two fugitive buffaloes or elk can be seen moving slowly over the stubble. The Corbin park is going to be one of the sights of New Hampshire and already its fame attracts visitors from every quarter; teams are going and returning; the lively stable business of Newport is stimulated and at the gamekeeper's house thrift has established a lunch table piled high with cakes and pies and fruit. We all came away wishing good health and long life to that distinguished son of New Hampshire, Austin Corbin.—The Republican Champion.

(Much has been written and said about the game preserves in foreign land; but how many know that such estates as Mr. Corbin's exist in the United States. A little of the Henry George single tax application would lessen the pleasure of such a possession.)

Arresting Sheridan.

Little do we know the experiences of the men whom we meet daily in our walks. Almost daily, a certain Worcester ex-patrolman may be seen who once had the fortune to put Phil Sheridan on the defence. It came about thus. Private R. was on his post, doing sentinel duty, on the very outpost, in the Shenandoah Valley. While thus guarding the Union, he discovered a horse and rider approaching. Nearing, the individual appeared to be a very innocent countryman who wanted to pass the guard, offering all sorts of rubbish as an excuse but the guard would take nothing but the countersign which the party seemed to know nothing about. He had dismounted and approached quite near to the sentinel who, however, halted him. "Well," says the countryman, "I f I can't go on, I can get on my horse again." "Not a bit of that," replies the guard, "You may stand just where you are till the relief comes," and his rifle is handled for business. When the corporal and relief come along, the former says, "What have you here?" "Well I don't exactly know, but I should think from the way he talks he was a d—d fool." At this a number of horsemen ride up and the arrested party, throwing back his farmer's big coat, reveals the buttons and stars of a Major General. He says, "You see I am General Sheridan, I suppose I can go now." "That depends. If you are Sheridan, you've got the countersign and you can advance and give it." Whereupon the General, who had been testing the mettle of this outpost, did advance and give the word properly. Then all rode on, but the next day the story leaked out and the soldier's associates told him he would catch it for making the General stand. That very day he was summoned to headquarters and was made an orderly there, the General remarking that he thought no spies would get in while such a soldier as R. was about.

Prison Survivors.

As a rule there is a sombreness hanging over a meeting of surviving prisoners of War that does not prevail when regiments and companies reunite. Their common memory is one of sorrows and horrors and, as a consequence, the ghastly is likely to take precedence. The more than forty men who assembled in G. A. R. hall, Friday afternoon, one week ago, represented a large share of all the places used as prisons by the Confederacy. The old board of officers were re-elected as follows: President, Charles M. Smith, Worcester; vice presidents—A. S. Atherton, Wakefield, Reuben M. Colby, Worcester; secretary and treasurer, William Jubb, Fitchburg; chaplain, A. E. Stearns, Worcester; executive committee, Albert Mason, Luther D. Goddard and A. S. Graton.

In the evening, nearly sixty men sat down to an excellent dinner, served by Landlord Tower at the Lincoln House. Following the disappearance of the food, and the eaters gave ample testimony that prison fare had not permanently disabled their appetites, came remarks by the President, Charles M. Smith, who exhibited relics of his prison life. After him, Alfred S. Roe spoke of revisiting Danville, the scenes of his prison experience; Luther D. Goddard told of Libby; Elisha T. Robinson gave a thrilling account of his imprisonment and attempted escape, also exhibiting a fac simile, in bronze, of the gold medal given to his brother, Major Robinson of the U. S. Army Pay Department for his services in rescuing Secretary Seward from the assassin, Payne. Geo. W. Hubbard spoke of his privations and observations as held by Dr. A. K. Gould, M. J. Chapin and Edwin Hoyle. It was a late hour when the meeting broke up.

Miss Flora A. Simmons, W. H. S. Class of '91, on examination, has taken a scholarship prize at Vassar, worth $125.

The Successful Man.

The successful man invariably bears upon his brow the marks of the struggle which he has undergone. The best sailors come from the roughest seas. They who seek to avoid care and labor, and who choose for themselves an easy path, are simply defrauding themselves of the noblest qualities of manhood, and are making themselves like mushrooms grown in the shelter, instead of oaks which have wrestled with a thousand storms, and which still lift their giant arms and sun-crowned heads triumphant towards the skies.

How true these statements are: when we see a man who is not successful, we need but look into his past life, and we find that he has not put his mind and whole purpose in life upon that which he is engaged; while on the other hand, if we see a man who is successful, we find that he has spent his time and energy in achieving that in which he has been successful.

For example, take the life of George Stephenson, the inventor of the locomotive, he was born of poor parentage, his father being a common laborer, hardly earning enough to support his family. George therefore at an early age was compelled to go to work. He made up his mind to be an engineer. He had everything to contend with, his education had been sadly neglected; but he did not shrink from his duty. Day after day he toiled alone, night after night he studied, little by little he gained ground, until he had reached the coveted position. Yet he was not satisfied. He wanted larger and greater success, and by continued perseverance he accomplished that which made the nations look on in astonishment.

He invented the locomotive, which to-day we could not get along without; but at that time, it was rejected by all.

For another example, take the Peel family, they were poor, and obliged to work hard for an existence; yet they managed by working day and night, and trying experiment after experiment, and as the result they introduced to the world the art of printing cloth.

But we need not go to Europe for examples of successful men.

We have but to look over the history of our own beloved United States, and written out in bold outlines, we see the names of many men, even by putting their whole attention to one object, have won success, which will never be blotted out, until the world shall cease to exist, and shall be no more. I will name a few of these—Columbus, the discoverer of America; his desire to accomplish one object, and his risking his all in accomplishing it, brought him to success.

William Penn, in his treaty with the Indians, was a success, and he spent his time in making it such.

George Washington, Abraham Lincoln and James A. Garfield, all ex-presidents of the United States, won their positions by continued labor and determination.

The wisest man has said in his Proverbs, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before obscure men." Has not this been true, and is it not true to-day?

The man who is diligent in business, is a desired companion, both of the industrious and the drone. Some man has said, "What has been done, can be done again," and it is so; men have won success, and man can do it now.

How sad it makes one feel, when he hears young men, just entering upon the struggle of life, saying, "There is no use of trying, I can never succeed."

There never was a statement more absurd than this. There is not a young man to-day, who, if he will but chose some occupation, and determine to stand at the head of that occupation, but what can do it.

How much more honor a successful man has, than a man who is not successful! A horse that is successful in winning a race, is the one that is looked upon with favor, while the others are shunned.

How much more then when a man is successful in an honorable business, or profession, is he respected than he who is not successful.

If all young men who read these lines, will from this time out, be diligent in business, and try to make a success of what they are doing; they will by perseverance reap success. The men who find fault with their position in life, because they are not as well off as others, lack something, and, although they do not realize it, they are the ones to blame, and not their employers.

There are men who are going to meet with success. Do you want to be one them? If so, you must commence at once, and learn your business thoroughly be patient, industrious, not fooling away your time, but making every moment bring you some knowledge of your business. A man who does this is bound to be successful. A. D. BUTTRICK.

SALEM COPELAND.

One day here, another there. It is only a short time since Mr. Copeland was making his regular trips to his work. While suffering some of the infirmities of age, his health had uniformly been such that he never lost much time from his daily round of labor. Thursday, Oct. 1st, a physician was summoned and he never left his home again. Uræmia was the name of the disease causing his death, which took place Saturday, October 2 at 2 p. m. Mr. Copeland was born in Thompson, Conn., Aug. 11, 1815, came to this city when twenty-three years of age and here pursued a long course of industry and enterprise. He was foreman for the Providence Screw Company, before its removal to Providence. After that he was tool maker for the Washburn wire mill on Grove street. He was subsequently foreman for Alzirus Brown, who then made agricultural machines. Then he became foreman for the late J. M. C. Armsby in the manufacture of pistols in the Armsby building on Central street. At that time he started the manufacture of the Cook extension divider in the Armsby building, under the patent of Dr. S. W. Cooke, dentist.

Mr. Copeland removed to the N. A. Lombard building, on School street, in 1873 and continued the same business there with C. W. Chamberlain, under the firm name of Copeland & Chamberlain, until 1889, when he removed to another part of the Lombard building and carried on the business there alone until July 24 last, when he formed a stock company with Charles E. Neale, Mr. Copeland being president and Mr. Neale secretary.

Mr. Copeland was a thorough workman in all that he undertook and is said to have made the first iron planing machine ever used. His home for many years was No. 2 Wachusett street, though before going there he was the builder of the cottage house No. 5 Dix street. While he was, by occupation, a mechanic, he had the greatest fondness for flowers and remarkable success in cultivating them. For years he has been the chief donor of flowers for the pulpit of Trinity Church, and the pleasure of church goes in seeing the results of his care was no less than his in presenting them. Perhaps an incentive to his floriculture was the fact that his wife, who died in March 1884, had for many years been an invalid, and he tried to make home as happy for her as possible. His wife's maiden name was Catharine Marcy of Southbridge, a member of that family so conspicuous in the history of our southern township. Mr. Copeland was her second husband. He leaves in Worcester a sister, Mrs. Paris Smith of Hancock street.

In his church relations, he was long a member of the Methodist church, first of Laurel street and later of Trinity, whose pastor, the Rev. J. D. Pickles attended his funeral, Tuesday, last at 2 p. m. at his late residence. The weather was almost a repetition of that when his wife was borne away to the tomb; but there was a numerous assemblage of those who had loved him in life and who wished to once more look upon his face. A quartette of sweetly blended voices sang "Come ye disconsolate" and "Abide with me" and the pastor of the deceased read passages from the Scriptures and followed with fitting words as to Mr. Copeland's good deeds and virtues, closing with a reading from Bryant, "I saw an aged man." The burial was at Rural Cemetery. His was a well rounded life. He attended prayer meeting the evening before his illness began, so there was no long time of mental and physical inaction and with his favorite anemones placed about his placid face, he looked as though he were merely resting, and, to the Christian, what else is Death than a final rest? He ceased, at once, to labor and to live. Along his accustomed walks he will be missed for many a day.

Mr. C. Frederick Goddard, W. H. S., class of 1891, who entered Phillips Exeter, to prepare for Harvard College, is doing very finely in that ancient school.

Dr. Herbert B. Howard, W. H. S., class of '77, Harvard '84, has succeeded to the superintendency of the State Alms House in Tewksbury. Dr. Howard was for several years in Colorado, having an excellent practice. In 1876, he was the reader of the Declaration of Independence in Mechanics Hall, at the last Fourth of July celebration had by this city.

"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown." Senior Vice Commander James K. Churchill, G. A. R., has his time pretty well taken. Monday night he was in Fitchburg, Wednesday in Oxford. Fairs in both places.

Church Notes.

CONGREGATIONAL.

The annual meeting of the Worcester County Sunday School Superintendents' Union was held Monday evening at the Young Men's Christian Association building. After a dinner at Rebboli's, a business meeting was held at which the following officers were elected: President, A. W. Edson; vice-president, James Logan; secretary, H. L. Miller; statistical secretary, Miss Ida Gaskill; treasurer, George R. Bliss; executive committee, the officers with J. M. Stone, P. G. Kent and H. M. Whitney of Auburn. Later there was a discussion on the subject, "The objects for which our Sunday School Superintendents' Union was formed," in which J. M. Russell, Arthur E. Gray, Hon. Chas. G. Reed, James Logan, J. A. Dodge of Grafton, M. M. Taylor and Mrs. M. P. Higgins took part.

BAPTIST.

Pleasant Street—This church is issuing weekly a very pretty little scheme having on its first page a picture of the new edifice and on the next a calendar for the week. The idea is excellent and ought to avail in bringing in many to the services.

Y. W. C. A.

Under the direction of Miss Grace Williams, the captain of the Young Womens Christian Association Boat Club, the young ladies held a very enjoyable peanut party at their rooms last week Monday night. The half hour preceding the contest was spent in a social way, after which came the chief feature of the evening. Prizes were awarded to the following, according to the size of their find: First, ladies—a pound of candy, won by Miss Topley; first, gentlemen—Mr. Prentiss; booby prize—a doll in a nutshell, won by Miss Mabel Wright. Over sixty young people were present and thoroughly enjoyed the evening. After the contest, the time was spent in music and song.

EPISCOPAL.

The following clipping from a Northampton paper will be interesting to many Worcester people because the rector of the St. John's church, Rev. P. M. Washburn, is the son of Charles F. Washburn of this city.

George Bliss, the New York banker, and a native of Northampton, has made public this week the fact that he is to build St. John's society a fine house of worship. Nothing is yet known as to the cost, but there is no doubt but it will be one of the finest structures in the valley. The site is certainly one of the very best in town, and the wonder is that President Scelye did not get the property for Smith college, especially in view of the fact that the institution now owns on three sides of the place. Practically the new church will be on the college grounds, and possibly may be known as the college church. At any rate many of the girls have been crowding into the little dark-brown church across the railroad track. The popularity and real worth of the rector, Rev. P. M. Washburn, and the fact that three of the leading churches of the city are without pastors may have something to do with this increased attendance. Certain it is that the society needs more room. The society was organized back in 1826 and the present church was built in 1829, being materially enlarged in 1855. Since Mr Washburn took the parish the debt upon the handsome new rectory has been paid off and a small fund started toward a new church.

METHODIST.

The first meeting of the Methodist Social Union after the vacation was held Monday evening in Trinity vestry. The room was tastily decorated with bouquets of autumn leaves on the walls and wound around the pillars.

An excellent supper was provided by caterer C. S. Yeaw and at precisely 7:15 the President, A. S. Roe, called the meeting to order. The divine blessing was invoked by the Rev. J. D. Pickles, after which he led the singing of the hymn "Blest be the tie that binds." After supper the President introduced the Hon. L. T. Jeffs, President of the Boston Social Union. He referred to the presence of the ladies, contrasting the custom here with the Boston Union which invites the ladies only at every third meeting. He also spoke strongly of public free schools and America for Americans.

Rev. C. A. Littlefield, President of the Connecticut Valley Social Union rehearsed the progress of Methodism in the Connecticut Valley, giving statistics both of church and league. Albert J. Manchester, master of the Thayer school, and President of the Providence Social Union spoke of the lax interpretation of the Bible and the needs of farther development of Christian love. These three gentlemen were guests of the Union. Remarks were also made by the Hon. C. C. Corbin, and the Rev. E. T. Curnick of Webster.

The song by Miss Aileen Kennedy was finely rendered and was heartily applauded. There were many ministers present and it would have been pleasing to have heard from them; but the hour was late, and the meeting was closed by singing the doxology.

Trinity. An old fashioned union Love Feast was held in this church last week Friday evening. The pastors of all the Methodist Churches in the city were present. This is the first of a series of such meetings.

The following officers have been chosen by the Epworth Leagues for the coming year: TRINITY. President, Edward F. Miner; vice-president, O. M. Donaldson; secretary, Miss C. Eugena Wood; treasurer, Franklin B. Darfee; chairman of committees, religious, Mrs. G. H. Brackett; social, Mrs. John Legg; literary, Miss Mary A. Drake; finance, Wm. A. Warden. Chapter No. 584.

LAUREL ST. President, Sylvanus A. Walker; 1st vice-president, F. A. Whitman; 2d vice-president, Mrs. S. A. Walker; 3d vice-president, Miss Annie Hunter; 4th vice-president, Mrs. A. L. Sargent; secretary, John Dobie; treasurer, Fred Porter.

CORAL. Haven Chapter, No. 4206. President, G. W. Hastings; 1st vice-president, Carrie M. Bunce; 2d vice-president, Edelbert M. Howard; 3d vice-president, Mabel V. Stanhope; 4th vice-president, Mrs. E. R. Merrill; secretary, Nellie M. Knowles; treasurer, W. E. Higgins. Elections in November.

GRAVE. No. 582. President, Frank J. Metcalf; 1st vice president, Miss Cora D. E. Robinson; 2d vice president, W. T. Rogers; secretary, Mrs. A. S. Roe; treasurer, W. C.

Healy; auditor, F. N. Tainter; directors, Miss Edna Raod, D. K. Taber, W. A. Pentecost.

WEBSTER SQUARE. President, J. L. Thomas; 1st vice president, A. D. Stone; 2d vice president, Minnie Bacon; 3d vice president, Henry Guy; 4th vice president, Helen Guy; secretary, Etta Rawlins; treasurer, Hattie Tainter.

The following were the delegates that went to the annual convention at Portland. Trinity—Mr. and Mrs. John Legg, Mrs. W. E. Howe, Mrs. E. F. Miner, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. A. Warden, Miss Florence D. Warden; Coral Street—Rev. J. O. Knowles, Mrs. H. C. Graton, Richard D. Murphy, Will E. Higgins, Miss Cora E. Perry, Miss Nellie M. Knowles; Webster Square—Rev. W. N. Richardson.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Lothrop's Opera House.

Lothrop's Pleasant Street Opera House still continues to be the best paying theatrical venture in the city. The immense crowds which attend the evening performance attest the fact that the class of entertainments given is what the Worcester theater-going public has long wanted.

"Claire and the Forgemaster," a French society drama, in which Miss Kate Glassford and Mr. Charles Barringer are the particular shining stars, has been received with great favor. The costumes of the ladies and the stage settings are perfect. Each performance is preceded by a farce, chock-full of funny situations, entitled, "Slasher and Crasher," in which Lothrop's Comedy Company has an excellent opportunity to display its talent. The last performance will be given this afternoon and evening. Patrons will avoid the rush by securing the tickets in advance. Manager Armstrong has recently completed arrangements whereby it is now possible to purchase tickets in the large hall. Every need, necessary for the comfort and enjoyment of the audiences is looked after with eagle eye.

"A Legal Wrong," a melo-drama of intense interest, which was written and played by that well-known dramatic actor, Dominick Murray, in all the principal cities of America, will be the attraction next week. It is at present receiving its first presentation by Lothrop's Stock Company at the Lothrop Museum in Providence, with Miss Ethel Tucker in the leading role. Already a large number of seats have been secured by numerous theater parties.

Theater parties, by the way, are becoming very fashionable at this cozy little theater.

School and College.

WORCESTER, Oct. 11.

MR. ALFRED S. ROE, Dialist.—In this week's edition of LIGHT I noticed a statement to the effect that the Worcester High School foot ball eleven usually defeats the Dalzell School eleven in practice games. Allow me to state that of the three practice games, that have been played between the two schools, Mr. Dalzell's eleven has won every one with the following scores: First game, 12 to 6; second, 16 to 0; and third, 22 to 4.

Yours sincerely,

A PUPIL OF MR. DALZELL.

The above letter is referred to the High School correspondent.

CURIOS CORNER

Why they are "Suckers."

The first settlements of Illinois were made in the southern portion of the state. The land was new and rich, and yielded abundantly with but little cultivation; but there were no means of transportation or markets, and money was scarce and hard to get, an old-fashioned picayune looking as big as the bottom of a half-bushel, and was carefully hoarded to meet some contingency. As a result of this state of things all the surplus population regularly every spring took up their line of march to the Galena lead-mines where they worked during Summer, and as regularly every Fall took up their line of march for their homes in the southern part of the state. This being the habit of that numerous family of fish called suckers, which then, as now, ascended the streams in the Spring and decend in the Fall, the bands of Illinois settlers fluctuating between their homes and the mines soon became known as suckers, and later on the name was generally applied, and Illinois became known as the Sucker state, and her people as Suckers.—Galesburg Register.

The First American Flag.

The first American flag that was saluted by any foreign nation is owned by Mrs. H. K. P. Stafford, of Cottage City, Mass. The flag has thirteen stripes and twelve stars. The patriotic ladies of Philadelphia presented it to John Paul Jones, whose name has become famous for the successful victories he gained for America. It floated from the mast of the Bon Homme Richard in its engagement with the English vessel Scrapis, and was shot away and fell into the water. Mr. James Bayard Stafford, father of Mrs. Stafford's husband, a lieutenant, jumped into the water and saved it from an untimely fate. He was wounded by a British sword and disabled for life. After the war was over the flag was presented to him for meritorious service. Three thousand dollars have been offered for these old "stars and stripes." It was exhibited at the centennial by Lieutenant Stafford's daughter. At the inauguration of President Harrison it was carried in the procession.—Congregationalist.

A well-known physician of Quebec went over to Ontario by request and prescribed for a patient. He has been fined $100 for it, because he was not registered in Ontario.

After returning from the theatre at night, Mme. Bernhardt eats a light supper, at which only one hot dish is served. Her big meal of the day is her 12 o'clock breakfast.

Senator Palmer once worked for 25 cents a day on an Illinois farm, and afterwards learned the trade of a cooper. He paid his own way through college.

Uncle Benjamin.

The story is told that, once on a time, a certain family lived in the same house with a brother of General Butler. As frequently happens, the children of the respective households fell out, whereupon one of the little folks not a Butler, said, "Well, I wouldn't have a father that stole spoons." To which the Butler replied, "It wasn't our father that stole the spoons, that was Uncle Benjamin." This is not an ad. for Butler's book.

Graham Muffins

BY MARIA PARLOA.

For twelve muffins there will be required half a pint of graham, half a pint of flour, one generous tablespoonful of sugar, one tablespoonful of butter, half a teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful and a half of Cleveland's Baking Powder, one egg, and two gills and a half of milk.

Mix the dry ingredients and rub through a sieve. Turn the bran from the sieve into the mixture. Beat the egg till light and add the milk to it. Stir this into the dry mixture. Add the butter, melted, and beat well for half a minute. Bake in buttered muffin pans for half an hour in a moderately hot oven.—(Copyright, 1897, by Cleveland Baking Powder Co.)

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Cleveland's Baking Powder is the antidyspeptic leavening agent. The leaven comes from cream of tartar and soda, nothing else; no ammonia or alum.

Good to Eat.Stuffed Eggs.

Boil six egg fifteen minutes. Cut in halves, take out the yolks, mash fine, add a tablespoonful of melted butter and two tablespoonfuls of grated cracker; season with salt and pepper, rub together until smooth. Fill the hollows of the whites with the mixture and press together. Dip first in beaten raw egg, then in grated bread crumbs, then in the egg again, and lastly in bread crumbs. Fry in boiling lard. Serve hot with cream sauce.

In serving chocolate shake a very little cinnamon over the filled cup to make the beverage like the chocolate of Mexico and Havana Venison.

Have the steak cut about an inch thick. It may be cut from the loin or leg. For one pound of steak, put in the granite-ware dish one tablespoonful of butter. Place over the lighted lamp, and when the butter is so hot that it begins to color slightly, lay the steak in it and dredge lightly with salt and pepper. Cook for six minutes, turning the steak four times. Keep the dish covered while the steak is cooking. Serve on very hot plates. Cold boiled sweet or white potatoes, can be fried in another dish and served with the steak.

Another Method—Cook the steak the same as by the first receipt, but when it has been cooking for three minutes, add one table spoonful of currant jelly, one tablespoonful of lemon-juice, a grain of cayenne and one whole clove. Stir this well in the dish. When serving the venison put a little of this gravy with each portion.

A Third Way—Slices of rare cold roast venison can be prepared the same as in either of the foregoing receipts, cooking them four minutes.

Waffles

Into three cups of flour stir one teaspoonful of cream of tartar and one saltspoonful of salt. Then add two cups of milk, two well-beaten eggs, one tablespoonful of melted butter, and, last of all, half a teaspoonful of soda dissolved in very little warm water. If the batter should prove too stiff, add a little more milk.

Some excellent taffy may be made by taking one quart of molasses, and a half a pound of butter, and boiling the two until the mass thickens. This will take about half an hour. Then stir with a spoon until, on taking out a little taffy, it becomes hard on immersion in cold water. Take half a teacup of vinegar, pour into the mass, and stir for a half a minute. Then pour the taffy into buttered tins, or dishes, and set aside to cool.—The Ladies' Home Journal.

Put into a bowl a cupful of powdered sugar; mash all the lumps; then put into it two teaspoonfuls of milk, stirring until smooth; add enough more milk, drop by drop, to bring the mass to about the consistency of cake batter, being thick enough not to run and thin enough to spread easily; add a few drops of flavoring rose or vanilla, as the case may be, and the frosting is made. If chocolate icing is desired, about an eighth of a cake of Baker's chocolate, broken in small pieces and allowed to melt in a tin on the back of the stove, may be briskly stirred in while warm.—Good Housekeeping.

Beef Tea for Invalids.

Take a nice steak, remove all the fat, put it on a perfectly clean gridiron, over a clear bright fire, watch it that it may not brown, turn it two or three times until it is hot through, then cut it in small pieces and put the pieces in a lemon squeezer and press the meat juice quickly into a hot cup or bowl, in this way every drop can be extracted from the steak, season it carefully, and give it hot and the most delicate stomach will relish it. A few spoonfuls will be more nourishing than a cupful prepared in the ordinary way. D.

Oatmeal Gruel.

Mix four tablespoonfuls of oatmeal in a little cold water, then stir it into a quart of boiling water, cook twenty minutes, then add a little salt and sugar. D.

proves it.

Chicken Broth.

Take half a chicken, remove all the fat, break all the bones, boil half an hour in three pints water, season and strain it.

To prepare an egg for a sick person, beat the egg until very light, add seasoning to taste, then steam until thoroughly warm through. This will not take more than ten minutes, and the most delicate stomach can easily digest it.

Six hard shell clams, wash well, boil in one pint water for two minutes, strain carefully, if too salt, dilute with hot water.

How to Reduce Flesh.

Many people who are moaning to-day under a load of ungainly fat could, in one year, gain a form of symmetry and comfort. The plan used is very simple, needing only perseverance and patience. Any one trying these rules faithfully will, at the least, lose one pound of flesh per week. The plan has been tried with great success. To begin with, rise at seven o'clock, take a warm bath, then give the body a hard rubbing; for breakfast eat any kind of fruit in season, soft boiled eggs, oatmeal or hominy with fruit-sauce (no milk, meat, sugar, nor fish, allowed). One hour after breakfast, go through a course of physical exercises, which must be followed by another good rubbing; then take a half hour's rest, spend the day in active business or pleasure, but eat no lunch and dine at night upon fruit, or a few vegetables. Eat brown and rye bread, but eat no meat, no sweets, no liquids; the liquids of the fruit will quench the thirst sufficiently. Retire early, but first go through another course of rubbing that will be felt in every muscle and nerve centre of the body. If anyone will closely live by these rules and not get weary in well doing he will certainly lose those extra pounds that make a life a burden to him. D.

There are a number of ways of preparing beef for mince-meat, and several different cuts are used. The most common cut is a piece of the round which is boiled till tender. This makes a very good mince-meat. Cook-books sometimes recommend the use of beef tongue or the inside of a roasted sirloin, but this is so expensive that these pieces are seldom, if ever, made use of for this purpose.—Boston Budget.

Fashion.

A becoming and very stylish skirt for stout figures, that can be made of either silk or woolen, has a full, straight back, side plaited to meet in the middle and fan outward to the foot. The front is inlaid; that is the selvages of the front breadth are turned forward to meet in the center of the top and fastened, leaving them loose below, so as to close when the wearer stands and open when she sits. A straight breadth is sewed to each selvage, and the seams bound with inch-wide ribbon or galloon; or finished with two rows of machine stitching, half an inch apart. These breadths are simply joined to the back breadths, or laid in a side-plait, turning forward, farther toward the back and the edge finished as in front, at the option of the wearer. For a very stout figure a breadth can be inlaid at the sides, as in front. The foot is finished with a plain or machine-stitched hem; the latter when the seam are stitched.—Spectator.

OLD-FASHIONED jewelry is again coming in vogue. Garnets, which, though not expensive are among the most becoming and ornamental of stones, are entirely restored to favor, and it is said that the long forgotten onyx, the amethyst, and even the curiously-veined malachite will reappear, this winter. Formerly, pearl, onyx and malachite were conceded to be the property of the house decorator rather than of the jeweler. But some specimens of these stones have much artistic value. Wider bracelets and necklaces are seen, and it seems probable that the heavy bands which looked much like handcuffs may once more be considered beautiful. In short, this is a time to ransack old jewel boxes, and bring out whatever oddities lie hidden there.—Fashion.

STILL THE RIVER GLIDES AWAY.

Autumn lays are fast advancing,
Fields and meadows now are brown,
Cryer hues are yet enhancing Fairest Autumn's golden crown.
Still the river keeps its pleasure,
Spreading leaves and blossoms wide,
While the Summer's fullest measure
Yields to Autumn's coming tide.
Aye! the river runs forever
Mirroring now the Autumn day,
And though seasons thus may sever
Still the river glides away.

High School.

Already there is talk among the Seniors as to the class presidency. Already six or seven names have been mentioned in connection with the office. The election promises to be spirited and will furnish a topic of conversation for weeks to come.

Mr. Perry has experienced some difficulty in arranging to meet his classes in the evening lately. Either the weather has been cloudy or the moon bright, thus interfering with the viewing of the stars.

Miss Mary L. Bridgeman's classes in English Literature is at present pursuing the study of Shakespeare's "Henry Fifth."

At the meeting of the Glee Club held last week, Miss Florence Everett was elected club pianist for the ensuing year. There were one hundred and ten members present.

Miss Carrie Stockwell, formerly of the class of '93, but now at the Framingham Normal School, visited the school Monday.

The school has a novelty in the form of a new necktie. It is the invention of Mr. Geo. Hawthorn of the class of '92. One day the past week his entire recess was taken up in trying his new idea.

Miss Marguerite Marble, a daughter of Mr. A. P. Marble, has returned to school, after a year's absence on account of ill health.

Our worthy janitor, along with his other duties, cannot resist the temptation to study. He can be seen every morning in his office, eagerly scanning the pages of the Boston Globe.

Miss M. Edith Sessions wishes it stated that pressure of other duties will prevent her joining the Glee Club the coming year.

A galaxy of pleasing faces greeted President Witherby last Friday night as he called the meeting of the Summer Club to order. Before him sat about twenty members of the Aletheia, among whom were: Winona Taylor, Mabel West, Vida Newton, Florence Goddard, Alice Spaulding, Alice Foster, Edith Perry, Susie Fisher, Grace Morse, Clara Harrington, Bessie Keith, Alice Babcock. The young ladies were under the care of Miss Carrie A. Townsend and enjoyed the following excellent program rendered by the club: Reading, "Montogpaw," J. F. Monroe; paper, "America, Her Prospect and Career," F. E. Gilbert; declamation, "Pleading Extraordinary," A. F. Parrott; reading, "Tale of Pyramus and Thisbe," C. C. White; Question: "Resolved, that the United States Congress should restrict voters and not the States." Affirmative, W. L. Sprague, E. W. Goodell and H. H. Hill; negative, C. E. Andrews, E. C. Witherby and D. G. Burrage. The question, after a fierce debate, was decided in the negative by a vote of eight to six. The members of the club think it would not be a bad idea to have the young ladies come up to every meeting. Previous to their going to the Summer Club meeting, the young ladies of the Aletheia held their meeting in room 6, and carried out the following program: Piano solo, Miss L. Jackson; paper, "Life of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps;" Miss Alice Foster; reading, Miss Alice Gates; poetical medley, Miss Florence Goddard; Question: "Resolved, that literary men have done more for the world than warriors." Affirmative, Misses Perry and West; negative, Misses Taylor and Topanelian. The question was decided in the affirmative. Next week Friday, the club will have an "open meeting" in the school hall. All are invited.

The meeting of the Eucleia was well attended and with Mr. Chas. J. Hickey in the chair, the club listened to the following well-rendered program: Declamation, "The Lesson of War," M. Curran; declamation, "Sheridan's Ride," J. Gannon; paper, "The Chilean Rebellion," W. J. Foran; declamation, "The Martyr," F. McDermott. Question: "Resolved, that the liquor traffic in this State should be abolished." Affirmative, W. E. D. Stone, C. F. Leonard; negative, C. E. Dowd, T. C. Carrigan, P. J. McLaughlin, W. J. Foran. The question was decided in the negative.

The Assembly meeting was full of interest from beginning to close. The declamations were well prepared and the debate justly sustained on either side. The report: "The Grain Crops of '91," F. E. Knowles; oration, "Civil Service Reform," J. F. McGrath; extempore address, G. W. Elinwood. Question: "Resolved, that we find more worthy of praise than blame in the character of Oliver Cromwell." Affirmative, H. R. Larkin, W. L. Pentecost, John Reid; negative, G. W. Field, W. W. Branam, H. L. Belisle. The question was finally decided in the negative.

Boston University.

Last Spring the trustees appropriated $100,000 for an addition to the medical school building. The work is now going on rapidly and it is hoped that the building will be ready for occupancy by next Spring. This is much larger than the original school building and will contain the physiological and microscopical laboratories, the library, a museum, and a number of lecture rooms.

"This year the three years' medical course will be discontinued and hereafter four years of professional study will be required before promotion to the degree of Doctor of Medicine. Up to this year the four years' course has been optional.

Dr. Borden P. Bowne, professor of philosophy at the College of Liberal Arts is at work on a text book on Logic, and the manuscript is nearly ready for the printers.

This year the classes in Psychology and Theism are required to present original theses on prescribed subjects. Each member of the class in Esthetics this term will be required to write fourteen papers of four or five hundred and a thousand words each. A change is also made in the United States constitution class. Instead of using Wilson's "The State," as formerly, Bryce's "American Commonwealth" is the principal text book, and Wendell's "Comparative View of Government" is used for comparing the United States Government with the government of England, France and Germany.

The artists taking part were, E. P. Crierie, the vocalist; Mrs. Lizzie S. Bowen, reader; Miss Alma L. Collins, contralto; Frank A. Lalone, cornetist; Miss Clara H. Burnham, pianist. The good-sized audience which attended was very much pleased with the program and encores were frequent.

Mrs. N. D. Warden.

Mrs. Narcissa (Davis) Warden, widow of John Warden, died Wednesday, the 14th inst, at 4.45 p.m., at her home, No. 95 Park Street. Here she had lived for above forty-six years. Her age was 79 years, 10 months and 15 days. She was born in Orange, Mass., and June 14, 1837, was married to John Warden, who was formerly a tailor in this city, conducting a business on the site of the present Richmond Block, but later in life dealt in real estate. He died in 1865. The Wardens were early Methodists in Worcester, belonging to the old church, once standing in the Meadows, corner of Exchange and Union Streets burned in 1844. Later they were at Park Street and Mrs. Warden was one of the constituent members of Trinity. In her day, she was one of the active, progressive Christians in that body. She has not been well since Thanksgiving, whence her final illness seems to date. She leaves three children, Abbie L., Mrs. Charles H. Carpenter of J. H. Clarke & Co., Mr. John D. Warden of Fall River and Mr. Wm. A. Warden of Worcester. Her funeral is held today at 11 a.m., at her late residence.

TO THE EDITOR OF LIGHT—I flash you a glint of rude sunshine for your LIGHT, which I found in a letter from a friend at Washington, D. C., who, last week, heard the "Poet Scout" recite the following rhymes which are without publication, but I am favored with a copy, signed, J. W. Crawford, ("Capt. Jack.") Sunshine Behind the Cloud.

I never like to see a man 'erassin' with the damps
Cos' in the game of life he doesn't always ketch 'em
But I can always cotta 'em a fair sized squawp
Who takes his clothes and thanks the Lord it isn't any wass.

The're aint no think'ing and sweatin' at yer back Yer can't expect the troubles mo'n yer own show'n think.

Remember when beneath the leaf I yet a fern heard to bow'd

That God'll sprinkle sunshine in the trail of every cloud
If you should see a fellow man with troubles 'n' be unfur'd
An' lookin' like he did not hav'na friend in all the world,
Go up and slay him on the back an' 'feller. "How d'ye do?"

An' grab his hand so warm, he'll know he has a friend in 'em.

Then ax 'im what's a hortic' 'n' and hush his cares away.

An' tell him that the darkest night is just before the day
Don't talk in gray-ward palver, but say it right out loud.

That God'll sprinkle sunshine in the trail of every cloud.
This world at best's but a flash of pleasure and of pain.
Some days are bright and sunny, and some are shashed with rain.

An' that's just what it order be, for when the clouds roll
by.

We'll know how to 'preciate the bright and sunny day.
Then learn to take it as it comes, an' don't sweat at the pores.

Because the Lord's opinion doesn't coincide with yours.
So always keep rememberin' when 'ares your path is shord

That God'll sprinkle sunshine in the trail of every cloud.

Amateur Sport.

Success was stamped upon every feature of the Worcester Athletic Club's first open handicap meeting at its Oval at Lake View last Saturday. Never before in Worcester and not many times in New England has there been gathered together such an array of athletic talent. All the leading athletic clubs of New England and the two largest in New York entered their best men and, though some of them who had b been expected failed to come, enough champions did come to satisfy everybody.

The immense crowd which filled almost to overflowing the grandstand and bleachers was intensely enthusiastic and, yet, it was not partial by bestowing its applause on local men alone. Credit was given wherever it was due without regard to the emblem worn by the contestant. Zimmerman, especially, was a favorite, many in the grandstand forgetting, in their desire to see him win in spite of his severe handicap, the local men in those events. Queckberner and Curtis were also favorites, as well as Remington and George.

The Worcester Club's athletes made a very remarkable showing, being beaten in number of points scored only by the Boston A. A. and the Trimount A. C. Donahue's success was particularly pleasant. That he would win both of the shorter dashes, and that Freeman, another Worcester Club man, should take the second prizes of the same events, nobody had dared to hope. But that was just what happened. The winning by Allison of the first prize in the half-mile was also very agreeable to Worcester people, though it was not as great a surprise as the running of W. H. Fuller, who won third prize in the forty-four yards run. Before this season he has never been a contestant in running events but has devoted his attention to the jumps, in which he has been quite successful. But in the members' games during September he ran in the half and quarter-mile runs. In the former, with a handicap of forty-five yards he was a winner with a record of 2 minutes 11.5 seconds. In the quarter mile, with a handicap of eighteen yards he was a very close second to Bigelow who won in 51 seconds. Judging from these records, many of his friends expected to see him run well last Saturday, but when, with a start of only twenty-five yards on Remington and ten yards on Finneran, he led until within twenty yards of the finish and crossed the line a close third, they were very agreeably surprised. With a little more experience, Fuller will make a strong quarter and half mile runner.

The summary of the games is as follows:

120 yards hurdle. 1st, P. J. Finneran, B. A. A., 10 yards penalty, 18 sec.; 2nd, R. G. Brown, B. A. A., scratch; 3rd, E. B. Bloss, B. A. A., 3 yards penalty.

100 yards dash. 1st, J. J. Donahue, W. A. C., 2 1/2 yds., 10 1/5 sec.; 2nd, J. C. Freeman, W. A. C., 8 yds.; 3rd, A. E. Martin, Mel. A. C., 1-2 yd.

THE OUTLET OF LAKE SUPERIOR.

BY JOHN C. CRANE.

Sault Ste. Marie, (Soo St Mary) is an historical place. Situated at the outlet of Lake Superior, it has ever been an important point in the history of our country. It is reached by going up Lake Huron or by the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal. The writer visited this place famed in history in August last, going over the latter route.

For sometime previous to reaching the Soo, we had traversed a wild and desolate wilderness, climbing up the rocky heights that be-tokened that presence of minerals. At last we reached the station on the Canadian side and soon on we go over the great inter-colonial bridge that separates that point from the American shore. After crossing the rapids at the outlet, we find ourselves once more beneath the stars and stripes, and submit to be overhauled by the custom officer.

The Soo, as it is called for short, has a population of about 10,000, which is somewhat scattered. Here is the great ship canal that makes it possible for vessels from Duluth and other ports on Lake Superior, to find their way to the Atlantic. At this place a grand view is obtained of the lake and the numerous craft afloat on its waters. Many of the early French missionaries had here their field among the Indians in their labor of love. From this point in 1820, General Lewis Cass entered Superior with his canoes, on an expedition to find, if possible, the source of the Mississippi river. Over the great lake he made his way to its head and thence overland to Sandy Lake Minnesota. From that point he sailed to where its waters entered the river. He then pushed his way up as far as Cass lake, which was the highest point reached by him. Twelve years later Schoolcraft was at Sault Ste. Marie with another expedition for the same purpose. He pursued nearly the same journey as the former, and entered the Mississippi at the same point. Schoolcraft, however, was more fortunate than Cass in his explorations, for he succeeded in going beyond Cass lake (or as once known upper Red Cedar) and fixed the source of our greatest river in Itasca.

The traveler who visits Sault Ste. Marie cannot but be much interested in the place, on account of the part it bore in the early settlement of our country, and the important place it occupies as the outlet of the nation's greatest lake, and also being the junction of three important railroads of Canada and the great Northwest.

The Sault, or Rapids (Falls of St. Mary) was in early times the place where many councils were held with the Indians as it was for a long time, the stronghold of the Chippeways. The town was originally settled by the French fur traders and in 1820, there were not over twenty dwellings of the whites here. The bed of the falls or rapids is rocky and the excavations that have been going on for some time, have left on the shores for a long distance, masses of the red sandstone which attract the attention of the visitor. Peculiar white-stones are numerous here and at other points on Lake Superior water-worn into curious shapes, some of which were secured as mementoes of our visit. At the "Bawating" Falls of the Chippeways a ship canal was built in 1853, and in 1870 great improvements were made, the entire cost amounting to $5,000,000. Two others are now in process of construction as well as a new lighthouse of magnificent proportions.

Sault Ste. Marie was the ancient capital of the Chippeways, and even to this day their descendants are found here, telling of the departed glory of their forefathers. A day spent at this place will yield to the student a rich fund of historical information. No point is more prolific in Indian traditions and reminiscences of the days of the early fur traders than this, now abridged as "The Soo."

A glory departed—the Chippeway tells Of deeds of his fathers, at the Sault's wild hills. Of desperate contests on land and on lake With the foe who sought their stronghold to take. But the smoke of their battles long since died away. And the Chippeway passed from the Bawatings spray To his future home, that he still doth hold, Where he dreams of the glory of the days of old.

Dawn!
An Apostrophe to Our Flag.

BY F. O. EVERETT.

Shine there! Enfranchise! Emboldened by Liberty's Hope, and her loftiest aims! The peevish purpling shrines Of the clouds softly curling, till dim in the grey Of the morning, afar to the East, come the fins Of the pickets of day, as they sweep O'er the hills and the valleys, asleep.

And touch them with soft salutation. See! the King Sends his greeting! O flag, with thy stars and thy stripes;

As with sparkles of joy and of life all awing He flings showers of wealth on thy azure, and lights Up the blush of thy white-silk fold, With his deep tissue-impress of gold.

Wave then thee three arms in salute! Unbosom thy stars! Thou art woven with wonderful beauty for men! While the air's deep pulsations through loyal huzahs Send to thrill with allegiance again and again. Still thy holiest mission shall be 'U'nto all men the flag of the free!

Floot there! Supreme! A nation's grand heritage! Proud

Of thy ransoms from war's wild alarms! Free! free As the winds that from Heaven's wild battlements crowd To envelop thy folds in the great crystal sea Of the morning. Bright glisten thy stars To triumphant release from all scars! Boston, Oct. 12th.

Lynch—White.
Daniel Lynch of Boylston was married, Wednesday, in the Congregational church of that town to Mrs. Hattie L. White, for some time a teacher in the Worcester public schools. The first marriage in the church for more than fifty years.

The late Emperor William objected to the Banker Bleichroeder, and it was only by dint of pressure exercised upon venerable his majesty by Bismarck that Bleichroeder and his daughter were very reluctantly invited to court balls. Once his guests, the old monarch determined that the banker and Miss Bleichroeder should be hospitably treated, and finding that the young lady lacked partners and was left to sit out all the dances, he himself in person ordered every young officer whom he met in the ball-room to invite her to dance. Much to their annoyance the gilded youths of the Guard were forced to obey. They did so after their own fashion, however, and, marching up to the lady one after another, they exclaimed in far from engaging or affable tones: "Most gracious Fraulein, by the commands of his imperial and royal majesty I invite you to dance with me." The poor girl's mortification may be more easily imagined than described.

Pity and forbearance should characterize all acts of justice.—Franklin.

And yet, and yet I know
Out of the dark must grow
Sommer or later whatever is fair,
For the heavens have willed it so!

This Heater is unsurpassed for excellence of workmanship and is the best in the market. Now is the time to secure estimates. The following is one of a great number of testimonials from our leading citizens:

WORCESTER, MASS., APRIL 1, 1896.
THE ROYAL STEAM HEATER CO.
Gentlemen:—Having purchased two of your Heaters, one now in use three years, the other 2 years, I can safely say we could hardly keep house without one. I would rather take care of our Heater with 12 radiators attached than one parlor stove where I had to bring coal and carry away the ashes. Anyone intending to heat by steam should examine the Royal and note the working of the Grate, which I think is far ahead of any I have ever seen. I will gladly give information to intending purchasers. Respectfully yours F. E. BARNARD.

A young and pretty woman, pleasantly occupied, is always a pleasant subject for contemplation. Nothing fades the face and spoils the features more than long anxious hours spent over a stove or range which "won't work". None of this unpleasantness is experienced in using the Richmond ranges. They are quick and reliable. We are this season offering unprecedented bargains in these ranges. It is worse than folly, it is positive cruelty to a housekeeper to expect her to use an old stove or range when a moderate investment will procure this marvel of utility.

One of the chief advantages in living today is in having a perfect cooking stove or range. Don't fail to call and see the "Richmond" at the old store of

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1891.

No. 8

Let in through all the trees

Come the strange rays; the forest depths are bright,
Their sunny colored foliage, in the breeze,
Twinkles, like beams of light.

Autumn tints!

Can anything be lovelier? Late frosts give us the most gorgeous coloring.

What a blaze of glory the trees are in? What wonder that some people would have Autumn last all the year! Think of gathering nuts under a canopy more resplendent than the garbs of royalty.

America is pre-eminent in arboreal tints. The leaves in Autumn time, in the old world, lack something that American foliage possesses, abundantly. Bryant could not help, writing his "Forest Hymn." "How God's first temples are frescoed in October!"

It was Poe who wrote of lonesome October but he was liable to have spells of disagreement with everything and he must have been there when he wrote "Ulalume"; yet the refrain is melodious.

"The skies, they were ashen and sober,
The leaves, they were crisp'd and sere
The leaves, they were withering and sere
'Twas night in the lonesome October
Of my most immemorial year."

Poe was the poet of sound, and sense never was allowed to hinder a jingling rhyme. But we all love October, in spite of winds and poets words.

That enthusiasm is not altogether dead was evident when the immense Rink was crowded to the doors to hear "Tom" Reed of Maine talk on the issues of the campaign. From plan to finish, the rally reflected no little credit on the young Republicans who managed it. Pres. Batchelder and Secretary Wood gave an earnest of the enthusiasm that the young element is to infuse into politics. Mr. Batchelder's words were admirably chosen and his manner happy. Chairman Walker did well just what a presiding officer should do, introduced the speaker, paying him a merited compliment in so doing. Mr. Reed's speech convinced his listeners that the race of orators did not die with Clay and Webster.

Then next week, Mechanics Hall will ring with applause at the presence of Governor Russell and other Democratic notables. The plaudits will be just as loud and just as sincere as those that greeted Ex-Speaker Reed at the Rink. The divergence of public opinion keeps the public pretty well stirred up. Little danger of stagnation in Massachusetts.

Later in the week the Republicans have the hall again and there will be words from Col. Chas. H. Allen and more enthusiasm. After all the work and talk, black will continue black and white, white. But such philosophising does not alter the fact that political meetings are an absolute essential in representative governments.

A few days since, the GAZETTE printed several interviews with Worcester gentlemen about a new City Hall. Apparently the reported struck a "Common" streak for nearly all were in favor of using all or a part of this ancient heritage. But now Ex Mayor Davis, in the same paper, gives cogent reasons why the Common should be free from all danger of occupancy. Nor is the gentleman alone in his opinions. The Common is too good for a city hall even. Nothing permanent should be placed there but monuments. We must save something for posterity.

If Captain Willard Glazier does not satisfactorily prove to the world that he has really discovered new sources for the Mississippi, it will not be for lack of energy in pressing his cause. From York, Penn. comes a paper, The Age, with a long account of the recent trip and its results.

Hon. George S. Barton.

The sudden death of this estimable gentleman has removed from Worcester one of our most distinguished citizens and a very prominent business man. He did not go at the end of a long and prosperous career, but in the midst, of his course. To the casual acquaintance, he seemed to be a probable factor in Worcester interests for years to come. The son of Rufus and Nancy Barton, he was born in West Millbury, July 18, 1825, the youngest of nine children. From schools, he gained all that Millbury could give him and at twenty years of age came to Worcester, apprenticing himself to Howe & Goddard, makers of paper and calico printing machinery. In 1849, he became a partner in the business and with the same business he continued to his death. Since 1867, the corporate name has been Rice, Barton & Fales. Five years he was in the Common Council, four years an alderman and in '77 and '78 he was the senator for the Worcester district. For nine years he was a trustee of the Worcester County Mechanics Association. Two years, he was vice-president and in 1876 he was president. He was a director of the Worcester Safe Deposit and Trust Company from its organization in 1869. He was, at one time, a director in the Boston, Barre and Gardner R. R., and in 1880 was its president. He was also a heavy stockholder and a director in the Providence and Worcester R. R.

Monday, Oct. 12, he attended the regular meeting at the Safe Deposit, but, at noon, not feeling well he rode home. Though receiving the best of medical care he did not rally and at 3 a.m. Saturday, passed away.

In social life, Mr. Barton was prominent, being a member of the Brigade and Worcester Clubs. As a Mason, he was a member of Athelstan Lodge, and was an honorary of the Continentals. In politics, he was a Republican.

Mr. Barton was twice married. He first wedded Miss Emeline Blake of Pepperell who who died in 1882. Their children are Charles S. and Mrs. Etta Barton Witter, wife of George B. Witter. His second marriage in 1882, was to Mrs. George Dudley of Winsted, Conn. While formerly an attendant at the Salem Street Church, he has, late years, been connected with the Church of the Unity.

His funeral was held at his late residence, 851 Main Street, Tuesday afternoon, the Rev. Calvin Stebbins of the Church of the Unity conducting the services. There was a large attendance of the foremost representative people of the city. At 10 a.m., the large force of employes of the firm had filed through and taken a final look at their late employer.

The pall bearers were Hon. Moses B. I. Goddard of Warwick, R. I.; Hon. F. T. Marble, Hon. Samuel Winslow and Lewis C. Stone, representing respectively the Providence and Worcester R. R., the Worcester Safe Deposit and Trust Company, the personal friends of the deceased and the Rice, Barton & Fales Machine and Iron Company.

The burial was in Rural Cemetery One after another, prominent men who have borne business and civic burdens depart from us. Others take their places; but it will be a long time before the face and memory of George S. Barton fade from the public mind.

Mr. Crocker of the Davis Art Company was the artist of the fine crayon of the Rev. John Galbraith, recently placed in Grace Church vestry.

Sterling.

An excellent audience, both in quality and quantity, assembled in the Town Hall, Wednesday evening to consider political issues. The speakers were Alfred S. Roe and the Honorable Alfred S. Pinkerton of Worcester. The latter gentleman set forth most convincingly the reasons whereby the people of the commonwealth should support the Republican nominations. The new inn in Sterling is a gem and in its beautiful dining room an admirable supper was served at 10 p.m. to the speakers and members of the town committee. A new sidewalk extends from the Post Office to the Town Hall. Sterling is progressing.

Republican Rally.

The meeting at Mechanics Hall, next Tuesday evening, will be one of unusual interest. To the attractions of a possible and a past Governor is added the presence of Comrade "Jack" Adams of Lynn, or as he is known at the State House, Sergeant at Arms I. G. B. Adams. If there is an old soldier in Worcester, of whatever politics, who can hear Adams and doesn't, he deserves to be drummed out of camp. He went through the whole war, a member of a fighting regiment and he has a way of impressing his listeners that always brings down the house. Every veteran in Worcester owes it to himself to be on hand.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY

Vassar College.

[From a Private Letter.]

POUGHKEEPSIE, NEW YORK, OCT. 11, '91.

I suppose when you see this letter you will be amazed and wonder how I made such a skip from Dutchess county to Ulster, but as I informed you in a previous letter of an excursion to Lake Mohonk, given by Mr. Thompson, a generous friend of Vassar, I don't think you will be wholly surprised.

Yesterday morning, all the girls in the Norris Home dormitory were called at five o'clock. We arose, prepared ourselves for the pleasure of the day, enjoyed a hot breakfast and by fifteen minutes before six were gathered in front of the main college building. This day was the outing of the Seniors and Juniors with invited guests from the lower classes. Twenty or more barges were the means of conveyance, twelve in our load, including Prof. Dwight, curator of the Museum and teacher of Geology. We made a jolly party and at six o'clock we left the college grounds, passing by the porter's lodge and through the streets of Poughkeepsie, the Seniors blowing their horns and giving the Vassar cry. We reached the ferry boat, but there were too many Vassar girls for one boat, so we waited patiently for its return and, finally, we were all over the river and among the "Highlands." Here we passed through the mountainous regions of Ulster County, a long drive of sixteen miles. Toll gates and bands of gypsies varied the beautiful way and gave us a chance to express ourselves. Through the towns of Centerville and New Paltz we passed; then we soon began to ascend the mountain ranges. By winding, yet good roads, we climbed up "Skytop" of "Shawangunk Mountains." The views as we journeyed on, were grand and magnificent. Along the way we met barges filled with people coming from "Lake Mohonk." Among the number I recognized President Taylor of Vassar, returning from an Indian conference held the day before, at the Lake. After a long but not tedious drive, we came in sight of the stately public houses and the Lake. No word pictures of mine can give you an idea of the beauties of the scenes, spread out before us, as we approached, and were surrounded with the grandeur of this enchanting spot. Let it suffice to say, that Lake Mohonk is the ideal place to visit.

It reminded me of pictures of Switzerland that I had seen and the descriptions, given by Mr. A. S. Roe, in his lectures last winter in the Y. M. C. A. course. It was a great surprise to us to find such a beautiful lake on the top of the mountains. It is a gem, exquisite in itself, about one-half a mile in length and some hundreds of feet in width a spot more beautiful and interesting is rarely seen. When we arrived at the "Mountain House" and passed into the reception room, bright fires were burning in the fire places, giving a comfortable, cheering aspect to the scene. A large library and reading room; spacious halls with grand appointments, inside and outside, carried with them an ever present feeling of satisfaction. Hunger asserts itself always among the mountains. A traveller going skyward would be very unwise to economize on the start, as to his commissary. The kitchen and table maids, who always accompany the Vassar girls in their outings, brought in the lunch from the wagons and prepared the table in the dining hall. It was a caution and wonder to those not acquainted with the ways of the Vassarites to witness the hand and mouth gymnastics as the piles of sandwiches, eggs, cake, pickles and fruit upon their tables dwindled away and the hot coffee settling everything to the right spot. It is a saying, in this neighborhood, that the citizens of Poughkeepsie only on rare occasions invite the girls of Vassar out to tea. It is not because they are not well looked after in this respect. The training and exercise required, furnish a healthy appetite.

After lunch, a party of us proceeded to make the ascent of "Skytop." As up we went, beauties here and there met the gaze on every side. Now and then, coming across the little Swiss huts built along the way, we would enter, sit down and view the scenery. No words can express the grandeur of the vista. I have climbed the Hoosac Mountains and viewed the enchanting scenes of the Deerfield Valley, but the spectacle witnessed in the Shawangunk mountains surpasses all. Now we are standing upon Skytop, the hill of difficulty is reached at last, and we walk out on Pinnacle Rock and just drink in the vision. The eye could stretch over a broad expanse of sixty or more miles. It seemed as though we were up in a balloon, for the world below appeared so small. The road leading to New Paltz, by which we came, looked now to us, like narrow footpaths or silver threads; the villages and residences were scarcely larger than bird houses. Away off in the distance the Fishkill Mountains stretched their tops towards the heavens. How grand and glorious it has been to stand and look up at the mountains, but how much nearer heaven and to purer thoughts to stand on their summits and realize the gigantic works of God. His omnipotence seems so much greater.

We gathered a few stones and began our descent from Skytop, to wander in labyrinth paths where it was a joyful pleasure to climb over the rocks, and to hardly find our way, had it not been for the red arrows painted on the rocks. If any one loves to climb, and you know I do, here is the best chance in the world. Still it seemed as though I was in Switzerland, and I imagined myself a chamois leaping from rock to rock, over crevices and by precipices and I exulted and gloried in the power of leaping and climbing. Through the "Lemon Squeezers" and other difficult passes, where no fleshy person can go, the path led, and now, at the base of "Pinnacle Rock," we stand staring up at that straight face nearly five hundred feet high. Then again a sense of awe returns when we look at that frightful precipice. At last we trace our way out of this maze, and return to the hotel at the head of the lake. Toward Eagle Cliff, opposite Skytop, with the lake between, we bend our steps. Through little picturesque huts we passed down by the water's edge, crossing rustic bridges, going out over the waters and standing on rocks in the water, then passing through the beautiful valley of Lamhdin's Glen we went until we had nearly reached the cliff beyond; so here we turned about, and retraced our steps for the time of our departure was near at hand. The cave, grotto and other interesting places, for want of time, we reserve till we come again.

At the appointed hour we started in our barges from these delightful scenes around Lake Mohonk, with cheers for Mr. Smiley of the Mountain House, while we spelled V-a-s-s-a-r and the guests at the house fluttered their handkerchiefs—we left for our college home. On our way back, a rivalry sprang up among the drivers, seconded by the girls, as to who should lead the procession. Our driver, Barney Morgan, won the seventh place in line, just too far in the rear to take the first boat across the river. We reached Poughkeepsie in the early evening, passing through the streets singing college songs, till porter's lodge was reached; here we disembarked and, reaching our room, prepared ourselves for the closing event of the day. The supper bell warned us of the event and right gladly we obeyed.

After the ceremony came an elaborate supper, and several hours of social enjoyment.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"A Legal Wrong," a play well known to most theatre goers, is being presented at Lothrop's Pleasant Street Opera House this week, by the stock company of which Miss Ethel Tucker and J. Francis Kirke are the leaders. The play itself is one of the best which has been presented at this house since it was opened and the company is fully capable of giving it the finished performance which it requires. The farce "The Yankee Peddler" is exceedingly funny. There will be two more presentations, this afternoon and evening.

Seldom indeed in a popular priced place of amusement is a play of such high character presented as "The Ranch King," but it will be at Lothrop's next week. Appropriate scenery, fine stage settings and stage costumes are absolutely requisite. All of these prerequisites are promised for the coming production, and as the entire strength of Lothrop's stock company is to be employed in the cast, a most finished performance of this delightful romance of the Western border is assured.

The finished and favorite little actress, Miss Katherine Rober, will sustain the role of Pug, a precocious child of the frontier, a part suited only for a bright, bewitching and vivacious actress, and one for which Miss Rober is most eminently fitted. Max Freeman is cast for the character of Donald McDonald, the ranch king. Preceding the melodrama, the farce, "My Mother-in-law's Visit" will be given.

When you once profess yourself a friend, endeavor to be always such. He can never have any true friends, who will be often changing them.

Rev. Henry Werner Eklund.

The pastor of the Thomas Street Methodist Church was born in Huskvarna, signifying "The Housemill," a suburb to the city of Jönköping January 17, 1848. This city with a population of 20,000 people lies at the southern extremity of Lake Vättern, the second largest body of water in the kingdom, just a little south of latitude 58°. Huskvarna has 2,000 inhabitants, something more than 100 miles from Stockholm. The village lies in a charming valley at the foot of a tree-covered mountain range. Through this valley a river leaps by seven successive falls (Vattenfall) from 30 to 70 feet in height, all of these existing within a distance of less than an English mile. To this picturesque landscape may be added the resonant sound of the rushing waters. The water power here is very great. Formerly, it was a place for the manufacture of firearms for the Swedish army; but on the transfer of this work to the government shops at Eskilstuna, the manufacture of more peaceful utensils, as stoves and sewing machines, followed. Mr. Eklund's father, Nils M., was a mechanic in Huskvarna all his life. He was the head of a happy and peaceful home. The father, the soul of kindness, the mother, Helena Jacobson, inclining to strictness. She maintained a most rigid oversight over her children, having a more than usually clear mind; but her son says, today, that her rule was not too severe. The characteristics of father and mother blended to make of our Worcester pastor, an earnest, devoted, pushing minister.

The mother was the first teacher and at five years of age he was sent to school and began the catechism. His teacher was the village pastor, the Rev. Mr. Adrian, an able and aggressive man, who prompted his children to do their very best. He soon displayed an unusual interest in the youthful Eklund and remarked to the father that he must not make a mechanic of his boy but a minister; but the father could not afford the outlay for an education. Accordingly Mr. Adrian said that the boy would have to do as many other aspiring youths have done, "work his way up." "I will help him so that he need not enter the lower classes of the schools." This word was kept and with two of his own children, the lad progressed finely, acquiring a decided liking for books rather than for the playground. But there came an end to these plans and prospects, for the kind teacher was promoted to a larger parish in the south of Sweden. His successor had not the same interest in the boy, so, instead of preparing for the state church at the age of sixteen, he went into the shop. He said to his father, "I'll be dead before the end of the first year," so strong was his disappointment over the end of his ministerial expectation. But his kind father showing him that the first way was blocked, he gave himself to the task of making himself a first class mechanic. He still found time, however, for reading. Had Pastor Adrian remained, quite likely Mr. Eklund had become a well read clergyman of the established church. He was to be a minister but not of that denomination. In 1866, a great revival of religion swept through that part of Sweden and he was converted. In March 1869, with his parent's consent, he left his home for Rockford, Ill., where he had relatives who were members of the Methodist church. His parents had especially cautioned him against falling into false doctrines, laying particular stress against the Methodists. In his ignorance, he promised but he found himself quite unable to keep the same, for in 1870, in spite of himself, he was drawn into this body, so much reprobated by his parents. After three weeks of trial he became a class leader and was taken into the church in full connection. April 8, 1871, he was prevailed upon to accept a local preacher's license and was obliged to preach once a week. Being urged to leave the shop and to begin study again, he began by private instruction, taking lessons in the English language, and then went through the Swedish M. E. Theological School, now permanently located in Evanston, Ill. He was ordained an elder in 1877, by Bishop Jesse T. Peck and was sent to Burlington, Ia., where he remained three years. Then came two years in Galesburg, Ill. In 1882, the Market Street (First) Church in Chicago, the largest Swedish M. E. Church in this country, requested the bishop to send Mr. Eklund there, to be the successor of the Rev. D. S. Sorlin who was once so successful in Worcester and whose body is buried here. Mr. Sorlin had had a continuous revival in his Chicago pastorate of three years and with Mr. Eklund it was just the same.

Then came a visit to Sweden, to see his parents and to study the workings of the M. E. church there. Accordingly, in 1885, he was stationed over St. Paul's church, Stockholm, by the Swedish conference, arriving in the middle of August. He soon improved the chance to visit his old home from which he had been separated nearly twenty years. To Mrs. Eklund, Sweden was a new world, for though of Swedish parentage, she was a native of Geneseo, Ill. In Stockholm, a revival accompanied his pastorate and he received above three hundred probationers into the church. He succeeded in lifting a debt of several thousand dollars from the church. So great was the interest in the meetings, he was obliged to hold two services every evening, the first beginning at 6 o'clock and ending at 7:30, when one crowd would go out and another come in. He spoke four and five times each Sunday and at least once every day in the week. The result was new ground occupied and a Mission church, now independent.

But all this was too hard. He could not stand it, and there was no chance for a change in Stockholm. So again he became Mr. Sorlin's successor and came to Worcester, on May 29th, 1887. His record here has been pretty well stated repeatedly. In the Thomas Street church, he found 134 members; there are now 340. The edifice, originally built for a Methodist chapel, then was the Church of Christ, has been added to, till there can be no more additions and now is quite too small. Every Sunday it is crowded to its doors, the Stockholm story over again. He has been asked for in Chicago, at Market Street, but he is anxious to locate in Lake View a part of Chicago where there are many Swedes and but small church accommodations. At one time it seemed as though he would go in October; but he will now doubtless fill out the full five years, ending in April next. To Worcester people, generally, this is a very satisfactory situation. We cannot anticipate the action of the next conference. Should any plan be devised that will keep Mr. Eklund, there will be very many glad hearts, for he is truly a pastor. He preaches and teaches. He finds places for both men and women to labor in. He is alive to all their interests. Worcester's liking for the minister is fully reciprocated by him and his family. He was married, Oct. 16, 1873 to Miss Almeha Christina Gustus of Geneseo, Ill., where her father was in business. He was a good union soldier during the War and marched with Sherman from Atlanta to the sea. Mrs. E. has seven brothers and sisters of whom she is the eldest. Mr. Eklund had two brothers, only one of whom grew up and he died in Upsala in 1879 aged 24 years. His parents died in 1888, the father in February, the mother in April. To our Mr. and Mrs. Eklund have been born three children, Arthur H., Grace Amanda, and Florence Almeha.

These nearly five years have served to make Mr. Eklund a well known man in this city. He is capable of almost constant work. His parents brought him up with the most intense dislike of all intoxicants and not a drop has ever passed his lips. He has never entered a theater, in a word, he is a Swedish Puritan constantly practicing what he daily preaches. The estimation in which he is held by his people is evident whenever and wherever they meet. He is devoted to them and they to him. Success to Pastor Eklund.

The Swedes in Worcester.

There are few records of more sudden and considerable growth than that of the Swedes in this city. In 1875, according to the census, there were 166 Swedes and Norwegians in Worcester. At this time there are probably more than 800. The chief motive for this very large settlement, is the extensive shops of the Washburn & Moen wire works. The iron products of Sweden have long been among the best in the world and skillful Americans have studied the art of iron making in that northern land. They have settled chiefly in Wards Two and Five, a large part of the flourishing village of Quinsigamond being made of their people. They make good Americans. They do not demand the teaching of their native language in the schools nor do they ask for special schools on any pretext. They seem in haste to be thoroughly assimilated, or better to be reunited to that portion of their race which turned southward from North Europe in the days of Hengist and Horsa to settle Great Britain. They are forging ahead in all lines of business and their names begin to appear in politics. In their wards they come near holding the balance of power. In 1868, Bengt Engström came to Worcester and worked as a potter. He may be accounted the Swedish patriarch of Worcester, at any rate, in length of residence. He still turns his wheel at 41 Water Street. In the same year comes Mrs. Mary Holter, a sister of Charles R. Frodigh. Her husband is a Norwegian. About the same time appear ed John P. Styffe, foreman of the Norton Emery Wheel company. John Engström came in 1879, as did Magnus Alström, foreman at Washburn & Moen's and John Jeppson, Superintendent at the Norton Emery Wheel Co. Among the Scandinavians who are appearing in business may be named as Grocers, Hans Trulsson, Lundberg & Lybeck, F. O. Dalquist & Co., Ryberg & Nylen, Magnusson & Förlén, Johnson & Thorn; Market men, Beck & Berg S. Hult & Co., Axel Carlson & Co., Boots & Shoes, C. J. Ekstedt & Co., Frodigh & Co.; Gents furnishing, A. W. Hjelm & Co., Gustaf Ellström; Music Dealer, C. F. Hanson & Co., Books and news, A. P. Lundberg; Intelligence Offices, S. E. Hanson, B. E. Bernström; Furniture, Carlson Brothers; General Store, C. A. Eklund & Co.; Merchant Tailors, Kronoff Brothers, Matson & Gustafsson; Contractors and Builders, L. M. Peterson, Nilson & Silven; Paper Hanger, Peterson & Nelson; Painter and Decorator, Alfred N. Jokelund. To these names must be added a large number of corporations and stock companies. The Swedish Church are the 1st Methodist in Quinsigamond, Pastor, Victor Witting; 2d Methodist, Thomas Street, Rev. H. W. Eklund; Swedish congregational, Providence Street, Rev. Karl F. Ohlsson; Swedish Baptist, Eastern Avenue, Rev. J. V. Hjerström; and the Swedish Lutheran, Millbury Street, Rev. Sven G. Larson. All these bodies have united to hold a Fair in Mechanics Hall Oct. 28-31. The cause to be benefited is the Swedish cemetery in New Worcester, a cause that is dear to all Northmen's hearts. The response will surely be a generous one.

The Fifteenth.

It is memories of Ball's Bluff that induces this Worcester County Regiment to come together on the 21st of October. Considering the services and the fatalities that befell General Devens' "boys" it seems strange that so many survive to fight the battles o'er. Only a very small number of regimental organizations can tell of more casualties than "The Fifteenth." Wednesday, there was over them the shadow of their Colonel's death. It was a well meant tribute to propose to leave the presidency vacant on his account, yet one that the General would hardly have approved. The men took it thus and promptly put in place General Kimball of Fitchburg who, though Colonel of the 33d, has many choice associations with the regiment to which he was first attached. A large part of the meeting was devoted to reminiscences of the departed officer. The business meeting was in the hall of the Royal Arcanum and dinner was served at the Lincoln House.

Ayer's Pills, being convenient, efficacious, and safe, are the best cathartic, whether on land or sea, in city or country. For constipation, sick headache, indigestion, and torpid liver, they never fail. Try a box of them; they are sugar-coated.

Albert Tolman.

The remains of this aged gentleman, so recently an object of love and respect, as he walked our streets, are buried today from his late home on Catherine Street. Later, LITTON expects to refer, at length, to his life and works which surely do follow him.

Wesleyan.

The prospects for a successful year at Wesleyan seem even more bright than they did at the beginning of the term. The Freshman class now numbers nearly eighty, while to the upper classes a few new names have been added and hardly any decrease in these classes is noticed.

The new electrical course is a feature which will no doubt attract the attention of many; having a capable man at its head, Prof. E. B. Rosa. A new building has been fitted up to be used expressly for this course and no pains will be spared to make the course of great utility to those who wish to pursue it.

The addition of Prof. Rosa to the faculty gives opportunity for more elective work in physics, which department is under the general supervision of Prof. Crawford.

Mr. W. W. Daniels of Princeton, the new tutor in political economy, gives entire satisfaction and the trustees are to be congratulated on securing so desirable a man.

The same may be said of Mr. Nicholson, the tutor in Latin who comes to us from Harvard.

The courses in Latin and Greek have been enlarged and the facilities for a deep research into the ancient languages have been increased.

At the Spring meeting of the trustees, a sum of money was appropriated for a gymnasium and we are assured that work will be begun upon it in the Spring.

The most enthusiastic college meeting which has been held for years took place two weeks ago, when an entirely new athletic scheme was adopted. Nearly two thousand dollars was raised among alumni and undergraduates to be used for promoting the general athletics at the college. The effort made last year at Springfield aroused the fellows and we are sure of doing better work there this coming Spring.

The football team is doing good work and though many good men were lost from last year's team, the chances for success are very good. The religious interest at Wesleyan, for which the college is noted as well as for work in other lines, is greater than it has been for a long time. Mr. Sayford, the college evangelist, has just closed a series of meetings which have been very well attended and in which much good has been done.

During the Summer, four Wesleyan men were engaged in city mission work in New York City, being supported by voluntary subscriptions from the students.

It is probable that before long a new recreation hall will be built. It is needed and will be hailed with delight by students, as the rooms which are now used are not very convenient.

The regular initiation took place two weeks ago.

At this time many of the alumni as well as under grads from other colleges were present. At "Alpha Delta Phi" over eighty men assembled including delegations from Yale, Trinity and Amherst. "Psi Upsilon and Epsilon" also had a presentation from the alumni.

The Y. M. C. A. of the college are planning a course of lectures by distinguished men, the first to occur in a few weeks.

Holy Cross.

The Provincial of the Jesuit order has been visiting the college during the past week.

The class of Philosophy had a specimen last Friday on "Dialectics" at which most of the faculty were present.

The field sports were held on the campus last Saturday and were very successful. The Juniors succeeded in carrying off most of the prizes, McKone especially distinguishing himself for his brilliant runs. The Senior's tug-of-war team proved to be the strongest in the college. John H. O'Connor '92 was chief-marsh. Mr. J. Frank Quinn acted as referee, Danl. J. Downey as starter, and James P. Leary as timer.

A foot ball team has been organized at the college and is practising daily under an experienced trainer. It bids fair to be very strong. J. P. Phelan '92 has been elected manager and J. C. O'Donnell '92 Captain. Should the "Techs" consider a challenge, a good game may be looked for.

Boston University.

President William F. Warren read a paper on "University Extension" before the ecumenical conference at Washington.

The students of the University were addressed at the Young Men's Christian Association Hall Sunday afternoon by Rev. Chas. L. Goodell, 77 pastor of the Highland Church. The Y. M. C. A. male quartette furnished appropriate music.

E. H. Bennett, the dean of the Law School, resumed his work in the school Thursday. He has been abroad for his health.

The Philomathian Dramatic club gave a "matinee" last Friday afternoon. The play presented was "A Box of Monkeys." It was a grand success. "Lend me Five Shillings" will be the next attraction.

The freshmen of the College of Liberal Arts have organized a foot ball team, with the hope that it may develop into a college eleven. W. A. Nichols, '95, is captain, and A. B. Meredith, '95, manager. Players and positions are: Left end, Howard; left tackle, Harding; left guard, Wyman; centre, Howell; right guard, Meredith; right tackle, Catterm; right end, Perkins; quarter-back, Noyes; half-back, Flower and Jones; full-back, Nichols.

Polytechnic.

The regular meeting of the Tech Elect was held Tuesday evening, and the large number present showed this society to be one of the most popular at the institute. Papers upon "Elementary Electricity" with explanations of apparatus occupied the time. The attendance was twenty-seven, although a rainy night.

Hon. J. H. Walker's address to the students Monday morning has attracted considerable attention. The city papers quoted from it in articles all the way from four lines to a column and a half, and the Boston Globe commented upon it editorially. His allusion to the political economy taught in the colleges as all humbug was what stirred up the hornets' nest.

About fifty of the students returning from the Reed meeting at the rink last Saturday got entangled in the branches of a large tree which had been cut down near the corner of Lancaster and Highland Streets and, before they could release themselves, were dragged to the top of Tech Hill. There the tree fell across the front steps of Boynton Hall, and the boys crawled out uninjured. "A P. I." for the tree was given and then the crowd started on a two-mile tramp across the city to give the Home School a serenade, only to find the girls had all gone to the theater that evening to see Modjeska. When the stragglers got back to their rooms the next morning, they were to say the least, tired.

Since last week's LIGHT appeared, the Institute Eleven has played two games of football, and each time was defeated. The first time by the Cambridge Manual Training School, 13 to 6, and the second by Harvard Freshmen, 20 to 10. Of course there are the usual number of croakers who say "I told you so," and argue that the Tech never can play football and might as well give it up now as later. But the students generally, though disappointed, are by no means discouraged. If football had prevailed in the school to any extent for three or four years, so that the players had had experience, if the eleven had been coached, if there was a gymnasium, then these two defeats would be discouraging, but as it is with an eleven made up of men some of whom have almost never played the game until this fall; without the instruction of skilled players and with the practice of but one or two games, defeats mean little. The Institute three years ago had a victorious eleven. There is still an opportunity for another this year.

This afternoon the eleven plays the Amherst "Aggies" on Worcester Oval at 3:30. A fine, close game is expected. Next Saturday, at the same place, they meet the Harvard second eleven.

High School.

More than a score of visitors has been among us from different parts of the state this week.

Tuesday, after a week's intermission in the rhetorical exercises, a most enjoyable hour was spent in the hall, the following being the program: Reading, selection from "Lady of the Lake," Miss Clemence '93; bass solo, Mr. W. B. Tower '92; reading, "How the old horse won the bet," Miss Flossie Flint, '93.

Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock 97 members of the Glee Club met under the direction of Prof. Richards, and passed a very pleasant hour. Previous to the club work, Mr. A. C. Whiting gave a mandolin solo, "The Flower Song," Lange. The selection was exceedingly well rendered and a vote of thanks was extended to Mr. Whiting by the club.

In my letter of two weeks ago I made it appear that the school football eleven usually defeated the eleven from Dalzell's school. Allow me to correct the statement. What I meant to imply was that although the school eleven was usually defeated, yet it contained the best men and showed the more skillful playing.

Miss Alice Babcock, formerly of the class of '94, has left the school and is attending Hinman's Business College.

A party of young men from the Assembly and Summer Club visited the presentation of "As You Like It" at the theatre last Friday night. Among the company were: George Matthews, Wm. Tower, A. H. Meriam, E. C. Witherby, Hector Belisle, W. W. Orr, and John Reed.

It is rumored that there is to be a school paper run outside of school, yet devoted wholly to the affairs of the school. The pupils will look forward to its appearance with much expectation.

At a largely attended meeting of the Senior class Monday noon in the lecture room, the class voted to send a bank of flowers as a token of their esteem for Miss Nellie Agnes Daly, one of their former members.

Mr. Perry finally hit upon a pleasant night, Wednesday, when the classes in Astronomy came up to pick out the starry orbs.

Smoking around the school building has been carried on to a great extent lately and recently Mr. Wight found it necessary to reprimand several of the boys. It is to be hoped that this will stop all further trouble as it reflects not alone on the person, but upon the school.

Miss Hattie Littlefield, late of the class of '93, has entered Becker's Business College.

Wellesley.

The advantages of college life in the country away from the hurry and distractions of the city are very evident, and Wellesley is so near Boston that it is not deprived of hearing many who represent active work in the world.

Oct. 3, Mrs. Adeline Emerson Thompson, '80, spoke most enthusiastically of the College Settlement work in New York city. It is hoped soon to start a settlement in Boston.

The first Monday in October is always sacredly kept as a memorial day for Mr. Durant, the founder of the college, as it is very near the anniversary of his death. At his expressed wish, no monument, picture, or outward sign of his memory has been raised. Debarred from such an expression, former students who knew him so well gladly come on this day and try to introduce Wellesley's latest classes to the one who was such a prominent feature in Wellesley life in their day. This year Mrs. Louise McCoy North, '79, was the speaker.

Since we last wrote Prof. Ryder of Andover Theological Seminary, Dr. Palmer of Andover and Dr. Nordell of New London, Conn., have occupied the pulpit on Sunday.

Oct. 15, Dr. Schaufier spoke most entertainingly of the difficulties of mission work in the crowded tenements of New York city. At the close of this address he conducted a Bible reading for the Student Volunteers.

Prof. Whiting, Miss Emerson, senior president, and Miss Steinson, junior president of '62, represent the college at the Temperance Convention in Haverhill, this week. Miss Emerson is to speak of the position of Wellesley on the temperance question.

During the past weeks, the college has been filled with discussion as to the best possible candidates for the class offices. Elections are at last over. Miss Geraldine Longley has been elected a member of the executive committee of '92, and Miss Bertha Longley is vice president of '94.

Smith.

The social event of the Fall, the Sophomore reception, was given to the Freshmen in the new gymnasium Wednesday night. The Sophomore colors, crimson and white, were effectively used everywhere, from the decorations of the class room to the lettering on the dainty programs. The souvenirs were especially pretty and appropriate, and '94 congratulated itself on the success which the evening certainly was.

Last week Monday night a general informal reception was given to faculty and students in the gymnasium. It lasted only an hour and all enjoyed themselves so much that it will be probably followed by others. In consequence of the great size of the college, more effort is needed to let all become acquainted, and it is hoped these receptions will help toward accomplishing such a result.

The elective gymnasium classes of Seniors and Juniors, have already begun work. With the new gymnasium, the new system and the new teacher, good results are expected.

Thursday was the Annual Mountain Day, a holiday given to the students for all day excursions and good times. It is always fully appreciated and improved and this year was no exception to the rule.

Miss Alice E. Robbins, W. H. S., 1889, is Vice President of the Sophomore class.

Mrs. N. Allen, 80 years old, mother of Mrs. Geo. Burr, 10 Walnut street, fell Thursday morning and broke her left arm just above the wrist and also dislocated the latter. Dr. Rich reduced the fracture and speaks encouragingly of her condition.

Church Choirs.

Rehearsals have begun for the cantata "Ruth," to be given in Piedmont church. The composition is by J. Astor Broad, formerly of Worcester, and in its presentation the quartet will be assisted by a chorus of fifty voices under the direction of Seth Richards.

The Last of Earth.

It was a sad scene that took place at St. Anne's church last Monday morning. It is not very often that father and mother are buried at the same funeral. Mr. and Mrs. Philip Kelley were buried from their late residence on Gage Street last Monday. The services consisted of a solemn high mass of requiem at St. Anne's church, Rev. E. H. Tober, celebrant, Rev. E. F. Brosnihan, deacon and Rev. W. F. Hartigan, subdeacon. The interment was at St. John's cemetery. Mr. and Mrs. Kelley had been married forty years.

The funeral of Miss Nellie A. Daly, formerly a member of the W. H. S., '92 took place from St. Anne's church Tuesday morning. There were many floral tributes, including a pillow inscribed "92" in blue immortelles from classmates at the High school. She had passed the examination for the Normal School last February and would probably have entered had not ill health compelled her to relinquish her studies.

The Wrong Schoolhouse.

Jack came down to breakfast holding both hands to his jaws, as if without that support they would inevitably fall off. His face was the picture of gloom, appropriately framed in by the white handkerchief tied around his head.

"How do you propose to teach school today, Jack?" inquired my uncle Peter.

"And oh, Jack!" I exclaimed, "you were going to take me out with you today."

I was visiting Jack for the first time, and he had promised me for that day a private exhibition of his pedagogic methods and subjects, in which matters I took a mild interest, since I look forward confidently to a professorship after graduation, if not Harvard or Yale, perhaps in Habinston Academy. Said Jack to me, "Why can't you visit the school as you intended, Will, but as teacher?"

Here was a chance to test my professional possibilities. The school was two miles distant, and after directions as to my way, for I was entirely ignorant of the local geography, I set out with a confidence as high as Mt. Everest, while the handkerchief-muffled imposter of a cousin waved me to victory from the sitting-room window.

After I had scudded over more than a mile, I came short up against an unfortunate difficulty—a fork in the road.

"Jack said nothing about a fork in the road," grumbled I to myself. "Now what's to be done? I must hurry, or those young ones will go home again and miss some excellent instruction. That would be too bad. Stay! There is a native. Can you tell me where the schoolhouse is?"

"There's the Peacock School'ouse an' the Bensley School'ouse. One's down thata-way an' th' other this a-way."

"Which does John Lawrence teach?"

"Junno. I b'long in the Coon Crick distric', an' I dunno. Has yourn a big elm out in front?"

"Yes, that's it. Jack told me about that."

"Well you jes' follow on down that road there till you come to a school'ouse a settin' by the road, an' there it is."

A short walk soon brought me to the building. I found the door already unlocked, but no crowd of mischievous boys hailed my entrance. No one was there but a quiet little girl, sweeping up kindling chips.

"Your regular teacher will be unable to be with you today, Miss, but I will fill his place with what ability I can command. What's your name?"

I do not think I ever saw any one look quite so surprised as that girl did then. However I saw nothing very strange in the matter, and repeated:—

"What's your name? I am to teach you to-day."

"Alice Stanley."

"How old are you, Alice?"

"Eighteen."

"'Whew?" thought I to myself, "she doesn't look fourteen!"

The desk as a whole was quite a contrast to Jack's study-table at home.

The last bell rang and Alice Stanley came in. I quietly remarked, "I am to take the place of your teacher to-day. Will some one start a song?"

Calling a class, Peter Thompson failed to come forward. I urged him to no avail.

I took hold of Peter's shoulder. If commands are not obeyed, use force. That's my motto. Immediately Peter gave such a yell as I never heard from mortal lungs. I sprang back as if I had touched off a mine. Peter did not desist, but to the first burst succeeded an avalanche of blubberings that came down like the cataract of Dodore. I retreated in dismay and Peter halted with strange suddenness. He sulked behind his apron, however, till recess.

Confronted by those five infants the query rose imperiously before my bewildered mind, "How in the name of Pestalozzi do they teach children their letters. I took the reader and pointed to the first letter of the alphabet "What is the name of that letter?" I inquired. They gazed at me in stupid amazement.

"You surely know what that letter is. Tell me at once," I said I severely.

Motions in one or two eyes. Alice Stanley's hand goes up.

"Question, Alice?"

"Please, sir, teacher uses the word method."

The word method? What might that be? My course in college so far had contained no information on that point. Perhaps it was in the scientific course. To cover my confusion I looked at my watch. It was far past recess time, and I rang the bell.

I measured off just five minutes for the recess. Time was precious if the morning programme was to be completed. Promptly at the expiration of the time I rang the bell, and as the astonished company hustled back to their seats I noticed Peter Thompson's place vacant.

"Where is Peter?"

"He went home crying."

"Said he'd tell his ma."

"Said he warn't goin' to no old school," volunteered a dozen voices. I summoned "B geography." This was a class of intermediate grade, whose lesson for the day was Africa. All went smoothly until I began to talk about the animals of Africa, the lions and the giraffes and elephants. Up went a small hand.

"Teacher said they hain't no elephants in Africa."

Up from the back seat that hand again.

"Well, Alice?"

"Teacher didn't say that. Teacher said there was no elephants in Australia."

"Yezzar. Teacher said they was elephants in Africa. I forgot."

I do not know what was the matter with me. I certainly knew better, but I went on to tell about the kangaroos. I suppose the word Australia suggested them.

"Well, Alice, what now?"

"Teacher said there were no kangaroo in Africa."

"Alice, you may study your lesson. You are not reciting just now."

Right here the door opened wide, and in it stood a little bit of a woman, with a sun-bonnet on her head and a mop in her hand, the cloth frozen stiff. She panted with one hand on her heart. "Where's the schoolmarm?"

"He could not be here to-day. I take his place. Is there anything I can do for you, ma'am? May I ask your name?"

"I'm Missus Thompson. My poor little boy just come home a-cryin' as if his little heart would break, an' I'd just like to know who's been misusin' of him. I'd put the law on 'em, I would! Pretty gony on in a school-house, I must say! Oh, there you are, Miss Stanley! Why ain't you in your proper place?"

"Mrs. Thompson, may I see you a moment in the lobby?" asked Miss Stanley, while I stood entirely dumfounded.

"Spose you may."

While they went out I got my hat and overcoat and put them on. My brain was in a whirl. That little girl! But after all there was a certain air of maturity about her. And that Dekeleia! And the giggling. I was a fool. As I got out into the lobby, how, I know not, Mrs. Thompson was departing with a broad grin on her face. Miss Stanley held out her hand with several roguish dimples playing hide and seek about her cheeks.

"Pardon me. I thought at first some one was trying to play a trick on me through you, but I fear now I have been the trickster. I was quite tired and disgusted this morning. If you were a teacher—pardon me for imagining that you are not—you would know how glad I was to rest and hear some one else teach, and learn how." This last added slyly.

When she had directed me across the fields I lifted my hat and walked off. As Miss Stanley entered the schoolroom, I heard the tumultuous clapping and cheering.

I plunged fiercely on, reviewing the morning's experience with burning cheek whose fires were none the cooler by the time I reached my cousin's school, which also I noticed was fronted with a big elm.

As I went nearer the unmistakable buzz of a school in session greeted my ears. Wonderingly I rapped at the door. It opened, and lo, Jack.

"How's your tooth?" savagely said I.

"Might as well own up. It was all a trick. I came out here and hid. I was going to hear you teach all the morning, and then disclose myself. The boys were in the secret, but when you didn't come the joke was on me. Where have you been?"

But that I never told.—Amos R. Wells, in Detroit Free Press.

A story, which European newspapers seem to think will amuse their readers, is going the rounds that a few years ago a Western man, name unknown or not divulged, was suddenly elevated to the post of "Secretary of the United States Navy." He went to see the launching of one of the first ironclads. When everything had been explained, he deemed it necessary to say something, but found his mind a blank. At last, he suggested that "the darn thing seems hollow," and relapsed into silence.

In New York, on the East Side (says the Sun), there is a club of newsboys, bootblacks, and street gamins of every degree. One night, recently, the women of the church that supports the club gave the boys an entertainment, the main feature of which was a recitation by a beautiful East Side elocutionist. The woman, dressed in silks and lace, stepped out on the platform, and began to recite a pathetic poem, the refrain of which was—"Oh, where, oh, where is Mary?" The third petition of the inquiry was answered by a shrill voice: "She's on de Islan', mum, washin' fer de loonies."

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Studies in American History, Mary Sheldon Barnes, A. B., and Earle Barnes, M. S. Boston, D. C. Heath & Co., 1891. $1.25.

The first part of this duet of names is already familiar in connection with her studies in General History, a book that produced a genuine sensation in the educational world. Almost all history is written from some partisan standpoint. If unbiased at the beginning, the writer finds himself unconsciously sympathizing with one or the other side, ere he has advanced far in his task. But Mrs. Barnes, an American, aims to write an impartial American History; to show during the Revolution, even, the feelings of British and Tories who are generally given scant hearing by writers, this side the Atlantic. Then, too, in the vexed and perilous days of slavery and war, she states the sentiments of both sides. There is no reason why schools in South Carolina and Texas should not use the book as well as those in Massachusetts and Illinois. Going to the prime sources of history, the annals of the day, she runs these together, making a narrative, perhaps not so thrilling as one that tells our side only, but certainly one that is vastly more beneficial. The child, trying it, might find difficulty in acquiring a mastery of the manner; but once learned it would seem that the results should be most praiseworthy. A vast array of material is named whence were drawn the quotations given in the volume. With any considerable number of these books and papers at hand to still further furnish data, the theme could be made still more valuable. An interesting portion of the book is the concluding chapter, where pertinent issues of the day are named as subjects for the consideration of the student. Miss Mary Sheldon of Wellesley College and Oswego Normal School fame has become the wife of Earle Barnes, one of the professors in the new California (Leland Stanford, Jr.) University and together they project this book upon the public. If all the forthcoming books from the extreme Western University prove as valuable as this, then most truly will it merit its title of "The Young Giant of the West."

A Matter of Skill, by Beatrice Whitty, from Rand, McNally & Co., publishers, Chicago.

At first a young girl is packing a trunk and that is always a matter of skill. She is going to visit her aunt because Mr. Flight has fallen in love with her and she doesn't want to marry him and hopes he will forget if he tucks away. On the cars she is robbed of her ticket and purse as well as her watch. Mr. Jones, the son of a wealthy man who has recently moved into the hall on the hill near her aunt's, comes to the rescue and provides for her much against her will, for she is independence itself. The story from this point is a matter of skill in wooing, but her pride will not let her be too easy a victim and in pique he engages himself to another. The young man father loses his money and the forward man goes into business.

Mr. Flight dies leaving his money to Helen and she makes it a matter of skill to make Mr. Jones repeat his declaration of love. Needless to say she succeeds.

Dedham Historical Register, Vol. II, No. 4, Dedham, Mass., Quarterly. $1 a year.

In its terra cotta cover, with the picture of the Dedham Library and Historical rooms displayed, the October Register is gladly received. This visitor is proving the almost exhaustless character of the treasures that every town possesses in the way of local history. A beautiful heliotype shows us a fireplace in the library of the historical rooms about and in which are many articles used by our ancestors, while above it hangs the portrait of Mrs. Vose, the generous benefactor of the society. The essay descriptive of this collection was prepared by Miss Rachel M. Ferguson, a member of the last graduating class in the Dedham High School and for it she was awarded the first prize offered by the Historical Society. A second prize was given to Miss Helen L. Taft. Is not this a good idea, to divert the youthful mind into concrete channels rather than to make them devote so much attention to abstract matters. The title of the essay is "Domestic Utensils and furniture used in Dedham since 1635." Other titles are "Lusher Wills," "Dedham in the Rebellion," "Boston and Providence R. R.," "First Parish in Dedham," "Births in Dover, Mass.," "The Ames Diary," "Births in Franklin, Mass.," with Notes and Queries.

The Salem Historical and Genealogical Record, October, Vol. II, No. 2, Salem Press. $1.50 a year.

"Travelling in the Olden Time," is the first article in this number and it sets forth the way the early settlers took to travel about the Atlantic coast, a journey then from Boston to Philadelphia was much more of an undertaking than for our people now to go to San Francisco. Other subjects treated are "Notes on the Hines Family of Essex Co.," "Gleanings from English Parish Registers by Eben Putnam, the editor; "Inscriptions from the Charter Street Burial Grounds, Salem, and also from the Old Burial Ground in Plymouth, Conn.," "Records of Georgetown, Me.," "The Pillsbury Family Reunion," with Notes and "Queries." "Notes" with which the number concludes are not the least interesting items in the magazine.

Sir Walter Scott's Marjorie, edited by Mary Harriett Norris. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, Boston and New York.

This is the last volume published in the Student's Series of English Classics, prepared originally to meet the demand of pupils preparing for the examinations in English Composition on entering college. The editor prepared Silas Marner in the same series and is an instructor in English Literature. There is first a comprehensive biographical sketch of the great novelist; then important facts in his life. These should be well scanned by the student. After the poem, follow forty pages of explanatory notes. The latter are of peculiar value, betraying a deal of research on the editor's part. There can be no reason why the pupil should not be able to pass an examination on this great poem, should he do his part well. If he has the least love of rhythm, the melody of the poem will attract him, but that alone will not give all that should be known about it. The writer was "The Wizard of the North," a myriad-minded man and he used hidden allusions as though they were every day matters. The notes in this book clear up many a mystery. We cannot grow so old that the blood will not tingle at mention of Flodden Field. The poem is filled with passages that have become a part of our daily language "Charge, Chester, charge! On, Stanley, on!" were the last words of Marmion.

A Commercial Geography for Academies, High Schools and Business Colleges, by John N. Tilden. M. A., M. D. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, Boston and New York.

Here is something decidedly new. We have had Commercial Arithmetic and early in the century there was printed a Grammar of Commerce, but Dr. Tilden has surely struck a new vein, induced probably by the needs of a Commercial College which, also, had no existence, till recent years. The idea of the author is to give to young people contemplating a commercial life, in the most comprehensive manner, that training which shall best equip them for business. Accordingly much of the matter in descriptive geography is omitted. Consequently the student will find more stress laid upon the Erie Canal in New York State, than upon the fact that Saratoga Springs is an important watering place. There is enough of prefatory matter concerning terms used in all forms of geography, to put the pupil at ease as to their meaning. There we find a grouping under different countries of raw products, manufactures, commerce, seaports, cities, etc. In this way are treated the United States, Great Britain, France and other nations. The utility of this volume need not be confined to commercial colleges. Lying on the desk of any Grammar School teacher, it would be a book of constant reference, for it points to many facts that the careful, painstaking instructor is ever seeking to impress upon his charges. In brief, Dr. Tilden has culled from a wide range of science, history and description just what the learner ought to know about the surface and contents of this planet. It is not a book of statistics but there are enough of them to fully illustrate the text. It marks a decided advance in text book making.

The October number of the favorite sporting magazine, Outing, is a gem of artistic skill and literary ability. The opening chapters of Wenona Gilman's new racing story, "Saddle and Sentiment," occupy the leading position, but from cover to cover the October number is full of interesting contributions by well-known writers.

FENCING.

Ancient and Modern.

Friend, imagine yourself with me in a dense forest. There is light ahead and we must be near a clearing. We hear discordant cries and savage yells mingled with the clash of sticks. We reach the opening. Before us is a vast assemblage, a motley crowd, who, judging from the clothing worn, have boycotted the clothing stores and resorted to the skins of beasts for protection. But we do not look at this, the centre of the group claims our attention, for there in a clear space are two stalwart savages, the champions of their respective tribes, each armed with a club and protected by a shield. They are engaged in mortal combat.

One strikes at the other with his club. His adversary parries the blow with his shield and returns it. Back and forth over the open space they fight, striving for the supremacy of their race. Now parrying, now returning, now advancing, now retreating, now standing and returning blow for blow with the rapidity of lightning, now breaking away, and, for a moment glaring at each other like wolves, then close once more for the final struggle. It is short. One weakens and staggering under a well directed blow, is unable to parry the next and with the third is crushed to the ground.

His friends gather round and amidst cries and groans and the wail of the death song he is borne from the field to die. If he is not ready to do this he is gently assisted, for his relatives no longer want him.

The victor, on the contrary, is loaded with honors, escorted to a sumptuous feast and given his choice among the charming young ladies of the tribe for a wife.

This is an ideal sketch of the earliest fencing. The foil was a wooden stick or club, and used in the roughest manner. Skill was at a discount and strength at a premium, though it must not be supposed that there was no skill used in those early days, for there was the birth of our modern art.

The next step was to form the sticks into a sort of sword, pointed and with an edge, such as the Spaniards found in Mexico on their first visit. When metals were discovered, bronze swords were introduced and heavier shields were necessary. The bronze sword disappeared with the advent of tempered steel and to the present day no material has been found to take the place of or compare with the latter.

The form of the sword has varied at different times and in different countries. Those used by the Roman legions were short and strong, with a blade seldom exceeding nineteen and one-half inches in length, but two edged and calculated for both cut and thrust. These were the swords used in the Gladiatorial combats where great skill was often displayed. The head and body were generally partially protected by armor and a small shield was carried in the left hand. The British swords were large, long, heavy and clumsy; and those of the Normans and Saxons partook of the same character.

Shields were carried for protection, varying in shape and method of use, and the body partially or entirely covered with armor, until the sword became lighter and so much more easily handled, that it was used to parry with. Then the shield was abandoned altogether and a second sword carried in the left hand; this to be used when the right was disarmed, or, if the contestant was expert he would fence with both, sometimes together and sometimes alternating. Again the second sword was abandoned and a short dagger took its place to be used at close quarters. This was finally given up and a partial return to the shield was made in the shape of a well padded and armored glove on the left hand which was used to ward off the adversaries point.

In the mean time the sword was being made of finer steel with finer temper. It had grown lighter and handsomer and was considered indispensable to a well dressed gentleman's outfit. The art of fencing was becoming a study on the continent and was an accomplishment no gentleman would be without.

It does not appear that this weapon was used in England before the reign of Elizabeth; and Darci informs us that one Roland York was the first who brought into England "that wicked, pernicious fashion to fight in the fields in duels with a rapier called a tucke used only for the thrust."

About the thirteenth year of Elizabeth, he was held the greatest gallant that had the deepest ruffe and the longest sword. This was carried to such an extent that her Majesty made proclamation against them both and placed selected citizens at every gate to cut the ruffes that were over a sixteenth of a yard in depth and to break the sword exceeding a yard in length.

This small sword being always worn, was a most convenient weapon with which to settle disputes; in fact it was said that subjects were brought up for dispute that the gentlemen might show the skill with which they could handle their side arms.

Today there is no place where fencing is brought to such a degree of perfection as in France. Where the American uses his fists the Frenchman uses his sword. In this country fencing is becoming popular as a means of recreation as well as exercise, and there is no exercise better calculated for bodily strength and activity than fencing. By it the muscles of every part of the body are brought into play; it expands the chest, and occasions an equal distribution of the blood and other circulating fluids throughout the system.

To the polite speaker, it has been found to impart an ease and freedom of gesture attainable by no other exercise while teaching valuable lessons in patience and self-command.

Ladies as well as gentlemen delight in the exercise and there is nothing more fascinating than to watch the quick, easy movements of a graceful lady fencer. The art is now taught in all the large cities and in some foreign countries it is part of an education. Fencing is now practiced so generally in the large cities that it is becoming to Winter what tennis is to Summer. It ought to be encouraged and to be more thoroughly understood for it is all that can be desired for physical exercise and far pleasanter and more interesting than ordinary gymnastics.

The foil used for practice is of about the same length as the regular small sword, thirty-four and one-half inches, but much lighter. The blade is quadrangular in shape tapering from the hilt to the point which latter is generally blunted and tipped with rubber to prevent accidental injury. In addition to this a wire mask is worn to protect the face, and sometimes a padded vest or shield is used.

As a sport it is harmless while full of excitement, and calling for skill and dexterity.

As an exercise it is unequalled.

The man who does not get what he deserves must learn to be content with what he gets.—William Winter.

Woman's Relief Corps.

Though war has long been considered man's peculiar province, woman has ever borne her part in caring for the sick and wounded. Florence Nightingale and Dorothea Dix are names quite as fragrant as those of Napier and Grant. Whatever the sad reflections in a soldier's mind, when menaced by hostile foe, he well knew that anxiety for him was deeply felt in the hearts of mother, sister and wife. In many ways, during and after the war, they managed to alleviate hardships in homes where the stroke of battle had been felt; but the Grand Army was seventeen years old before an organization was effected for regular methodic work. It was in Denver, 1883; that representatives from Massachusetts met those from other states and united in the patriotic body, whose parts are now found in more than half the states and territories of the Union. Massachusetts claims the proud preeminence of leading in this mission of mercy. As she sent Dorothea Dix and Clara Barton among the very first to serve in the hospitals. So her ladies were the first to organize and their ideas prevailed when the plans for organizing were submitted.

Previous to 1879, there existed certain Ladies Aid Associations working in connection with the G. A. R. Department commander, Horace Binney Sargent, recognizing the merit of these bodies, sanctioned the assembling of a convention, which was called to meet in Fitchburg, February, 12, 1879. To this call, sixty-six delegates responded and a state organization came into existence. Mrs. Sarah E. Fuller of East Boston was made the first president. The objects stated were: "To assist needy members and their families in sickness and distress, and all needy and sick soldiers, sailors and marines, or the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers, sailors and marines; to do all in our power to alleviate their distress; to further the interests of all subordinate corps, and institute new corps throughout the state. Corps No. 1 was the E. V. Summer Corp of Fitchburg. In 1880, a similar body having been organized in New Hampshire, it was added to that of Massachusetts. In 1882, Connecticut came in, in like manner. Thus there was the nucleus of an order when the meeting came in Denver, July 25, 1883. Mrs. E. Florence Barker of Malden was elected first president, and from that day to this the Woman's Relief Corps, both in state and nation, has gone on with a constant record of prosperity. As has been seen, the order in Massachusetts is older than the parent body; an anomalous condition already accounted for. But it was not till after the Denver organization that George H. Ward, Corps 1, came into existence, the charter signed by E. Florence Barker, president, and Sarah E. Fuller, secretary, bearing date, May 4, 1883. The charter members given in the order of signing the application were as follows, read across:

The work of these women, and those who have joined since, has told in the comfort and happiness of many families. They have contributed food of all kinds, have clothed the poorly clad, have sent coal, paid rent and have nursed the sick. They have found homes for orphans, and have paid the R. R. fare for women and children to remote points in the West as far even as St. Paul and even to California. When fathers have fallen into evil ways, they have taken his place in caring for the defenceless. Is not this a mission of love and mercy? Is there not reason for the existence of the Corps?

There are matters, in the care of destitute families, that women can better attend to than men. So the Relief Corps comes in to do what their husbands and fathers cannot well superintend. From 1885 to 1891 inclusive, the corps has expended $993 55 besides, in this 1891, refurbishing Room 16 in the Soldiers Home in Chelsea at an expense of $180. Adding the first two years outlay, the Corps has expended more than $1,000. Considering the quiet way in which all of this has been done, the record is a proud one. But more means are called for. The fair in G. A. R. Hall next week Thursday, Friday and Saturday is to replenish the treasury. The object is worthy the patronage of every lover of his country. A dollar invested here will, in some way serve to ameliorate the woes of some distressed being whose record lays hold on the war. No worthier claim was ever presented to the citizens of Worcester. The presidents of the Corps from the instituting to the present are as follows.

Mrs. Lucretia A. Rice.

The first president of the Corps, perhaps to her more than any other one person, is due its organization. Her name appears second on the charter list, though she was the one who did the most interviewing and soliciting to obtain the names for the beginning. By common consent, the Corps regards her as its chief organizer. She is Worcester County born, claiming the good old town of Sterling as that of her nativity. Her father, George L. Stewart, a farmer, is still managing affairs on the old homestead, a most charming place for the summer vacation season. Three of Mr. Stewart's daughters married men who bore arms during the Rebellion. Mr. Frank H. Rice whom Miss L. A. Stewart married is the well known Main street photographer and was, in War times, a member of Co. K, 53d Regiment, commanded by General John W. Kimball of Fitchburg. They have only two children, Harry N., W. H. S., '89, Harvard '91 and now a student in the Harvard Law School and Miss Minnie, at home. As the first president of the Corps, Mrs. Rice has no record of previous offices; but in the State Department she has been Assistant Inspector, and Inspector, and was a delegate to the national Convention when held in Portland.

Never in robust health, she has, nevertheless, been a tower of strength in fostering and furthering the interests of the order. As inspector, nothing was allowed to prevent the performance of duties. Wherever she should be in carrying out the principles of the Woman's Relief Corps, there she was found.

Mrs. Jeannette P. Babbitt.

The daughter of Luther Gates, a Sterling farmer, this lady was born in that beautiful town and during a part of her childhood, went to school in the same house to which Mary's little lamb followed her one day. She came to Worcester in 1848 and her membership in the Relief Corps arises from the fact that her husband, Samuel Flint Babbitt, was a member of Co. F, 4th Heavy Artillery. In G. A. R. circles no people are better known than "Sam" or Flint Babbitt and his wife. But Mrs. B. has a claim to local note on her own account; for as Widow Bedott she has no equal in Worcester, and in amateur theatricals she has taken well many a character. For seventeen years, she has been the librarian of the Mechanics' Association and has watched over the growth of the library of that body from 4,000 volumes to this point where it is progressing on its eleventh thousand. Mr. and Mrs. Babbitt have one son, Harry C., who went from the High school in Mr. Peterson's day to the Institute, whence he was graduated in 1878. He is now the chemist of the Welman Iron and Slate Company, Thurlow, Penn. with post office at Chester. Mrs. Babbitt is a charter member of the Corps and was its first Senior Vice President and succeeded to the presidency in 1885. In all that pertains to the interests of the Corps she is active and vigilant.

Mrs. Angie A. Robinson.

Mrs. Robinson is the only President, thus far, who was born in Worcester. Her father was Timothy Kidder, a native of Vermont, who was a skilled mechanic and excellent musician. A brother of Mrs. Robinson, Geo. M. Kidder, served in the 4th N. H. Volunteers, was wounded at Deep Bottom, was taken prisoner, held nine months, came home and lived only eleven days thereafter, dying two weeks before the surrender of Lee. Miss Kidder, in 1861, became the wife of Wm. L. Robinson who was in the Navy during the Rebellion, serving on the U. S. Gunboat "Mangham." Few men in Post to are better known than Comrade Robinson he having been commander three successive years. At the dawning of the strife, as a girl, she worked, day and night, Sundays included, to make ready the jackets for the first Worcester soldiers, those militiamen who shed so much luster on Massachusetts. As a young wife, she knew all there is to be known of anxiety. Her first born child came in War times and was a bouncing boy of eight months before his father saw him. They have six children, George; Maud, who is Mrs. John E. Ewing of Providence; Wm. J.; Harry C.; Beatrice and Sally. Mrs. R. was one of the original members, passed through the three regular gradations to the presidency and since then has been treasurer two years. In the department Mrs. Robinson was, for one year, a member of the Executive Council.

She has attended nine Department and three National Conventions.

Mrs. Martha A. Denny.

The daughter of Robert D. Fisher, she was born in Northbridge, Mass., and passed her girlhood in that pleasant town. Mr. Fisher was a native of Halifax, N. S., and as a ship builder in his early days, helped construct the very vessel in which his subsequent wife, born in Edinburg, came to America. Later, coming to the states, he was a wheelwright and carpenter, in the latter business working among others for Tilly Raymond and Joel and Harvey Upham, helping build the Bay State House and Mechanics Hall. He died one year ago. Her oldest brother, John P. Fisher, was in the United States service and was lost at sea, off the coast of California in 1852. She was married to Daniel E. Denny April 17, 1867, though they were acquainted before he enlisted in Co. E, 42d Regiment. He is now, as he has been for some years a postal clerk on the Boston & Albany R. R. Their pleasant home is on West Street, near Highland, where they have reared their family of three children; Alice in Wellesley college, a High School girl of 1890, Arthur E. in his Senior year in the High School and Florence, in one of the earlier Grammar grades. A charter member of the order, Mrs. Denny, has served as Treasurer, two years, and then passed through the regular grades of Junior and Senior Vice Presidents to the final position of President. She has also served as Department Ass't Inspector and installed, instituted and inspected many Corps.

Mrs. J. Victoria Simmons.

This lady was born in Hamilton, Madison Co., N. Y., the daughter of Mr. George R. Waldron, editor of the Hamilton Republican and whose partner was Garfield's Postmaster General, Thomas L. James. She was married to Charles E. Simmons, Aug. 28, 1860. Mr. S. through Worcester born, went to Hamilton to attend Madison, now Colgate University and it was during his college course, that he married the editor's daughter. Mr. Simmons went to Madison rather than Brown on account of the wishes of his academy chum and he tells to this day of the laugh at his expense over his mistaking Madison County hop poles for bean poles, thinking that the New York variety of beans was unusually aspiring. After all, a Massachusetts Yankee need not be pardoned if beans were so easily suggested to him. Mrs. Simmons has reasons enough for being a member of the Relief Corps, for her father and oldest brother were members of the 157th New York and her husband was in Co. F of the 21st Mass. It was a singular coincidence that in the progress of the war all three of these near relatives were wounded in the same month. Today, her father is blind, through the usage of war and her brother is postmaster of Hamilton. Mr. Waldron, Senator, was for several years state librarian in Albany. An uncle of Mrs. Simmons, General W. F. Rogers, commanded a Division in the 6th Corps, going out as Colonel of the 31st N. Y. He is the commander of the Soldiers' Home at Bath, N. Y., and was Department Commander in 1878. He presented the name of Capt. John Palmer at the Detroit Encampment and was instrumental in his election. Her home was in Hamilton during the strife and there her eldest son, Charles G. was born.

This son was a graduate of our High School, Class of '82 and of Madison University, now Colgate, 1886. Subsequently, he took a theological course over, and is now a Baptist minister in Charlemont and Rowe, this state, where he has, also, found a wife. Henry D., the second son, went from our Grammar school to the Academy and, married, lives on North Ashland Street; Flora A. is a High School graduate Class of '91 and is now in her first year at Vassar; Hannah C. is in the first year at the High School and Edward Burnside is a nine years old lad in the Grammar School. He was born on the 20th anniversary of the battle of Roanoke Island, his father's first fight. Hence his name. Mr. Simmons is well known as a Baptist minister in this city, where he and his have been the most of the time since the War. Mrs. Simmons joined the Relief Corps in New York State, where her mother was the first president of the first Corps in the state and when Mrs. S. was president here, she initiated her own daughter, Flora, thus having three generations in order. In the Worcester organization, Mrs. Simmons has been Senior Vice President one term and was president in 1888. Since then, she has been an aid on the Department Staff and in 1890 was a delegate to the National Convention in Boston.

Mrs. Lizzie F. Hubbard.

As Lizzie F. Decker, her girlhood was spent in Hallowell, Me., where she and her future husband went to school, as fellow pupils, and where, as she says, they slid down hill together, an amusement that Maine people will be sure to remember, but the war was fought and won before they were married which was in 1865, Oct. 11. They celebrated their silver wedding in a quiet way in 1890. Mr. George W. Hubbard was a member of Co. E, 3d Maine Regiment, the one that General O. O. Howard came home from West Point to command, a regiment that saw the hardest kind of service during the conflict, and came home at last, crowned with glory. When General Howard visited Worcester in 1890, it was her husband's privilege to meet him at the station and to escort his old colonel to the Post 10 camp fire. The Hubbards came to Worcester in 1875 and Mr. H. is the armorer at the new armory at the north end. They have three children, G. Walter, once in the High School and recently in the Union Station Ticket Office; Lottie M., a graduate of the High School, Class of '90 and now employed in the Free Public Library and Addie E., who is in her second year in the High School. Mrs. Hubbard was a charter member of the Corps, her name appearing fourth in the list. She was conductor three years, Junior Vice two; Senior Vice one and President in 1889. In 1890 she was assistant inspector of the State Department.

As a girl, Mrs. Hubbard was one of the hard working girls who thought nothing too good for the soldier. Sewing, even taking her machine to the town hall that the hospitals might be well provided and soliciting and sending barrels and boxes to the front. She was one of the many thousands who made the country worth fighting for.

Mrs. Adelia J. Clough

Mrs. Clough is a native of Lynnfield Center,

Essex County, a daughter of John Perkins, long farmer and influential citizen of that place. Both of her parents are still living. Though no one of her immediate family was in the army, her favorite cousin died of starvation in a Rebel prison, and another cousin was killed in battle only a few days before the expiration of his enlistment. There are no Americans who were not in some way interested in the strife. She became the wife of Dr. Benj. F. Clough in 1871 and at once took up her residence here. Dr. Clough, a native of Kennebunkport, Me. had come to Worcester in 1869. His war record was in the Navy, being on the Flagship Blackhawk, of the Mississippi Squadron, and on the hospital ship, Red Rover. Their only child, Bertha F., a beautiful girl of eleven years died in 1884. Mrs. Clough, a constituent member, was, for three years, the treasurer of the Corps and then passed through the three degrees of Junior and Senior Vice Presidents to the President's chair.

Mrs. Anna H. Burbank.

the eighth and present president of the Relief Corps is New Hampshire born, a native of that granite producing town, Fitzwilliam, where her father, Silas White, tilled the soil. It was also his native town. Her ancestry is excellent, including a grandfather who served in the Revolutionary war for six years. Her early school advantages were those of her native town. In her immediate family, a brother, Wyman S., went into the war to suppress the Rebellion. He was a member of Berdan's Sharpshooters and is now one of the police force of this city. Miss White became the wife of Mr. Daniel E. Burbank in 1861, while he was a soldier in Co. A, 2d New Hampshire Regiment. Though the latter was not wounded, he saw something of Rebel prison life, having been captured at Williamsburg, in the Peninsula campaign. His business is that of an engineer. They have two children, Chas. E. now a Senior in Amherst, having been graduated from our High school in 1887, and Fanny, who has spent one year in the city's highest grade. The son will be readily recalled as the Commandant, for the last two years, at the Natural History camp. Mrs. Burbank is one of the charter members of the Corps, was Guard three years, and then passed through the gradations of Junior and Senior Vice President to her present office.

The regular meetings of the Corps are in G. A. R. hall, the second and fourth Thursdays of each month. The officers for the present year are President, Mrs. Anna H. Burbank; Senior Vice President, Emma A. Savels; Junior Vice President, Mrs. Camilla E. Jenks; Treasurer, Mrs. Addie A. Pinkham; Secretary, Fannie B. Allen; Chaplain, Mary S. Hine; Conductor, Flora A. Simmons; Guard, Sarah A. Towle. In the following roll of membership, the names of charter members, already printed, do not appear. Remembering that nearly every name represents some friend, living or dead who served as a soldier, the list becomes one of peculiar interest.

Landmarks.

Miss Freeland, whose history of Oxford the public anxiously awaits, says the old mile stone on Lincoln Street is the most interesting historical object in Worcester. Yet who can give its history? Let us stop one of the most aged men who walk our streets, Ex-Alderman, Samuel Porter, and ask him about it. "Mr. Porter, do you know anything about the old Mile Stone on Lincoln Street?" "No, only it was always there I guess. At any rate it goes back of my recollection. There used to be a similar one further along towards Shrewsbury and also one near where Austin Street comes into Main. Then, too, there was one in New Worcester; but I never heard when they were placed nor who put them in place." So much for Mr. Porter. Now we will interview Caleb Wall. He is not so old a man as Mr. Porter, but he has been taking notes all his life and he surely will be able to tell us all about it. Alas! We fail again, for Mr. Wall can only say that the memory of man runneth not to the time when it was planted. "It has been moved several times in the changes of the road and street but as to the time and agency of placing, I can't tell." Another gentleman, long an authority on local matters, says, "I have read somewhere, I am quite sure, that this is one of many stones placed along the old "Country Road" by a Provincial enactment made in Governor Belcher's day." If he be right, then the stone is more than 150 years old for Belcher was governor from 1730 to 1741. And again if this be the true version, the stone is a good argument for the wearing qualities of red sandstone, though the lettering, obviously, has been recut.

The "Country Road" was the thoroughfare from Boston to New York and Albany. In Worcester county, it passed through Northborough, Shrewsbury, Worcester, Leicester, Spencer, Brookfield and so on west to Springfield. The historians of all these towns mention the road but not a word about the mile stone. How much curiosity of to-day, a little care by the chronicler a hundred years ago, might allay! Draper of Spencer and others say that from Marlborough to Worcester it was called the "New Connecticut road" and from Worcester to Brookfield the "Country road." The exact date of its location is not known, but it must have been before 1725 for in that year the town of Leicester was complained because there was no bridge over Seven Mile river, a stream now in Spencer. Originally this road was simply a path through the woods, passable only for pedestrians and horsemen. It was thus traveled as early as 1674, when between Marlborough and Brookfield there was no dwelling, save a few log houses in Worcester.

As to the stone itself. Thousands of people have passed it scores of times with no attention whatever. In fact, were its presence to be mentioned to all those citizens who habitually travel Lincoln Street, fully one half would either deny its existence or would say, "Well, I never saw it." It is not obtrusive in form, standing close to the fence on the north side of Lincoln Street in front of No. 50. The figure incorporated in the heading of this article is an exact reproduction of the stone and lettering. It will be noticed that the distance by highway to Boston is less than by rail and that the traveller to Springfield will save six miles if he ignores the train and sticks to the "Country road." Time is not considered in the estimate.

One of our citizens whose boyhood was spent in Spencer, says he recalls a similar stone about where Prouty's shop is now, and that the filling in, to improve the road, covered it up. How many more can be remembered by those who read this article? Landmarks will be a regular theme in LIGHT and contributions are solicited.

One chronicler, Worcester born and reared, says, "I can't tell when the stone was put in place but I remember the following" A gentleman by the name of Goodwin, subsequently postmaster of the city of Lowell, says that in his boyhood, his mother sent him after a pot of white paint. On his return to his Lincoln Street home, just beyond Sawyer's lumber yard, he, boy-like, gave the top of the mile stone a daub as he passed by. He says that forty years afterwards he visited the city and found on the stone traces of that boyish freak. That must have been the very best kind of paint and lead and no barytes. Who has another story to tell!

Getting the most out of life is simply giving the most out of it. We only truly possess that which we share.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Mr. W. N. Manning of Rockport, Mass., publishes through Oliver Ditson Company of Boston a school song entitled "Our Country's Pride." The air is alert and catchy. The children will readily learn it and will like to march to it. Here are the words, quite apropos to the present situation.

"Hear scholars all, our country's call,
For brave men true and right,
To be filled by the boys who try
To reach the highest light.
Our fathers fought and dearly bought
Our freeman's righteous rights,
What noble gift for home and things
Out free American schools.

CHORUS.

Well march and sing, our song shall ring,
The stars and stripes we'll wave, we'll wave;
No foreign hand shall rule this land,
Our Country's Pride we'll save, we'll save.

Our nation great in every state,
The dearest blessings give,
To those that try without a sigh
A loyal life to live,
With courage strong we'll study long,
With grateful hearts will strive
Our very best before we rest
To make our Country thrive.

CHORUS.

Mr. Clarence J. Harris, who is about entering the Lay College at Revere, has composed a march, entitled, "Memories of Home" which he will dedicate to his mother. Mr. Harris is a Northbridge boy who has received his musical instruction from his mother, and the piece, as played by him, has an excellent effect, arousing, in the hearer's mind, recollections of youthful days. LIGHT expects a successful reception for the march.

FLASHES.

Sow an act and you reap a habit.
Sow an habit and you reap a character.
Sow a character and you reap a destiny.

God's plans, like lilies pure and white unfold;
We must not tear the clove that leaves apart,
Time will reveal the calyx of gold,
And when through patient toil we reach the land
Where tired feet with sandals loveliest rest;
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we will say, "God knew the best."

ABOUT FOLKS.

Comrade Churchill is still in demand for G. A. R. Fairs. Nov. 10, he goes to Milford; Dec 1st, to South Braintree. He may go to Salem, Nov. 19th. He will attend a campfire in Brighton, Nov. 12. The Posts throughout the state manage to keep the Department officers pretty busy.

The Rev. Joseph F. Lovering, formerly pastor of the Old South Church in this city was seriously injured in Boston last Saturday. While on his way to his Somerville home, by the collision of horse cars, he suffered the fracture of one of his ribs. He will be laid up for some time.

Miss Cora E. Cutter of Ashland, has been visiting Miss Nellie Davis 66 Hanover Street.

Upton.

Hiram Warren, aged 86, years died in Upton Sunday the 18th. He was the grandson of the Jonas Warren described in LIGHT of Sept. 12, in the article "Upton's Historic Houses No 2."

Hiram was the oldest of five living generations of the Warren family in town, he being uncle of Austin Warren, and Austin having a great grand daughter. Hiram never married.

On and after Oct. 20 the fast popular steamers of the Yarmouth Steamship Co., will make only two trips a week from Boston to Nova Scotia. They will leave Lewis wharf every Tuesday and Friday, at noon, connecting at Yarmouth for all points in the province and Prince Edward Island. Returning, they will leave Yarmouth for Boston every Wednesday and Saturday evenings, after the arrival of the train from Halifax.

Miss Silvester, an experienced French and German teacher, announces that she is prepared to receive pupils for instruction in those studies. She will also teach the English branches, if desired. Lessons may be taken at the pupil's home. Her address is 132 Austin Street.

The Eleventh Commandment.

The one exemplifying the commandment was a Japanese, born a heathen, but he discovered an elderly lady and a very small boy trying to carry a large straw bed down Walnut Street. The burden was too great for the boy, and the foreigner noticing the lad's struggle, pushed him aside and took his place. Right down the street to Main, he threaded the crowded thoroughfare carrying one end of that bulky article. If the recording angel was on duty, an entry must have been made to that young man's credit.

Abraham Lincoln.

Dr. W. J. Dawson, the distinguished English clergyman and orator, now in America on account of the Methodist Fumemical Conference, has been secured by Dr. Pickles of Trinity Church to give, next Friday evening, his lecture on Abraham Lincoln. An Englishman's opinion of the great emancipator must be of intense interest to Americans. Dr. Dawson is one of the most prominent men of his day in England and should be heard here by all who love Lincoln and his memory.

Luncheon Muffins.

BY MARIA PARLOA.

For one dozen muffins use one pint of flour, a generous half pint of milk, two tablespoons of Cleveland's Baking Powder, half a teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoons of sugar, three tablespoons of butter and two eggs. Mix the dry ingredients together and rub through a sieve. Melt the butter. Beat the eggs till light and add the milk to them. Add this mixture to the dry ingredients; then stir in the melted butter. Beat the batter vigorously for a few seconds and then put in buttered muffin pans and bake for about twenty minutes in a quick oven.—(Copyright, 1891, by Cleveland Baking Powder Co.)

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder is perfectly whole some. It leavens most and cleavens best. Try a can.

Good to Eat.

"Oh, green and glorious! Oh herbaceous treat!

"'Twould tempt the dying anchorite to eat;
Back to the world he'd turn his fleeting soul,
And plunge his fingers in the salad bowl."

Egg Dressing for Salad.

Three eggs, two tablespoonfuls of mustard, two tablespoonfuls oil or melted butter, one tablespoonful of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of white pepper, one-half cupful of cream, one-half cupful of vinegar. Cook all to scald, add the oil slowly afterward, and pour over any chopped salad.

To Glaze Pastry.

When the pastry is nearly baked, brush it over with the beaten yolk of an egg, and put back into the oven until glazed. This is for meat pies. To glaze the pastry of apple and berry pies, take half a cup of sweet, thick cream, and beat into it flour (sifted) enough to keep it from running. When the pastry is nearly baked, brush it over with cream glaze, and put back in the oven. Let it come to a light brown, or remove sooner, as you like.

Baked Eggs.

Place a layer of stale bread crumbs in the bottom of a buttered dish, and pour over enough sweet cream to moisten. Sliced hard boiled eggs, and put a layer with plentiful dots of butter, and a little salt and pepper. Continue alternate layers till the dish is full. Sift crumbs over the top, dot with bits of butter, and set in the oven to bake.

Apple Pudding.

One pound of grated apple, half a pound of butter, half a pound of sugar, six eggs, half a pint of cream, the juice and grated rind of one lemon; grate your apples; beat the butter and sugar very light, whisk the eggs and add the apples, cream and lemon. Stir all together, line your pie plates with rich paste, pour in the mixture and bake it. A few currants may be added.

Cake Pudding.

Here is a recipe for a "cake pudding," which, with the "vinegar sauce," makes a nice, plain, everyday dessert. Anyone desiring to make it richer can add butter or sugar (or both) to pudding and sauce: Take one egg, one-half cup of sugar, one cup of sweet milk, butter the size of an egg, two cups of flour, two level teaspoons of cream of tartar, sifted with the flour, one level teaspoon of soda, dissolved in the milk, one scant teaspoon of lemon extract. Bake the same as any loaf cake and serve hot in slices, over which pour the sauce.

Vinegar Sauce.

One half cup of sugar, one scant tablespoon of flour, rub perfectly smooth in a little cold water. Pour over this — stirring while boiling — three-fourths of a pint of boiling water, and boil ten minutes. Just before serving add a lump of butter half the size of an egg, and one tablespoon of good vinegar, stirring all till well mixed. Currant jelly may be used instead of vinegar, the quantity used being a matter of taste. We used both vinegar and jelly,—and a heaped tablespoon of jelly is needed, while more adds to the richness of the sauce.

Women Speakers.

In the late Universalist Convention, no one in it was more noteworthy than the ease and eloquence with which lady speakers addressed the meetings. The denomination has thirty or forty lady preachers and if the samples heard in Worcester are types of all of them, the sterner sex must look to its laurels. The grace with which Mrs. Thomas, President of the Red Cross Association, presided at the Thursday morning meeting is seldom equaled anywhere. Mrs. Bowles, Mrs. Libby and others who spoke are rare examples of eloquence. Mrs. Livermore is not the only Universalist lady who can make herself an object of interest through thought and word.

First Daguerreotype.

"Died at Malden, on Friday last, Mr. George Evans, aged 74, seven years our senior, but the friend and associate of our youth in the ranks of the old Fraternal Amphisborean Society, a young men's debating club flourishing for many years in Worcester in the early '40's. He was a cabinet maker, and in the employ of the Bancrofts paid his way to a graduation from the Manual Labor School, now the Worcester Academy. At the time of his graduation, the daguerrean art had just been introduced into Boston. He went down and learned the art, and came back in Worcester and opened his rooms over Dea. Lansing Wood's furniture store, corner of Central and Main Streets, where the first pictures ever produced with a camera this side of Boston were made by him. He sold the picture business to L. J. Knowles, afterward the millionaire pump manufacturer, and devoted himself to making and selling apparatus and giving instruction in the art. We were away from Worcester for some years from 1841, during which time he also removed and we lost track of him till now. But he was the first to take daguerreotype pictures in Worcester."—Rev. Albert Tyler in Oxford Mid Weekly.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

The McDonald Picturesque Scotland Musical and Novelty Company gave an entertainment Monday evening in Association Hall under the auspices of the Clan Scott, Order of Scottish Ladies. The large audience consisted principally of Scotch people and was highly pleased with the views, songs and dances of which the entertainment consisted.

The leading musical event of the week was the concert in Horticultural Hall arranged by Madame L'Espérance. From the lists of artists announced to take part every body expected a superior program of music and it was very evident while the concert was in progress that all expectations had been realized. Every number was encored. The program began with a piano solo by Mme. Alice Bardy-Dionne. She also played another solo later besides acting as accompanist for the singers. She very judiciously chose short selections and rendered them in an admirable manner. Melle. Eugénie Tessier, the blind cantatrice from Montreal won, by the two chants which she sang, merited applause and was obliged to sing twice more. Herr Heinrich Schücker, the solo harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, proved himself not only a master of his instrument but a true artist as well. He is apparently not over twenty years old. The violin solos by M. Alfred De Séve were, to a certain extent, disappointing. He was more successful in giving an exhibition of clever handling of his instrument than he was in producing real music. But the audience seemed to like it and on his second appearance, after responding to one encore, he was obliged to bow his acknowledgements five times before the applause would cease. Ben T. Hammond sang Mozart's grand air "Les Noces de Figaro" and he also sang the closing number, a duet, with Mme. L'Espérance. It is needless to say that both selections were well rendered. The concert was a decided success.

Household.

There are various disguises for nauseous doses. A strong solution of extract of licorice destroys the disagreeable taste of alo.s. Peppermint water disguises the nauseous taste of Epsom salts. Milk is a good abater of the bitter taste of Peruvian bark, and cloves that of senna. Castor oil cannot be tasted if beaten and thoroughly mixed with the white of an egg. Another method of covering the nauseous taste of castor or cod liver oil is to put a tablespoonful of strained orange juice in a wine glass, pour the oil into the centre of the juice, then squeeze a few drops of lemon juice upon the oil and rub some of the juice upon the edge of the glass.

There is a decided tendency shown to return to the higher and more massive type of table decorations, instead of the low, flat style which has been so long in favor.

Cheese Cloth.

A collection on the pantry shelf of pieces of this material, about fourteen inches square or larger, will many times save the wear that would otherwise fall on linen napkins. Its adaptability to cheese, butter, bread, and even meat, as a wrapping which may be easily cleansed, is well known, though sometimes forgotten; but for covering milk there is nothing that can supply its place. If it is wrung out in clean water, then stretched on the top of the vessel and plastered around the sides, it will prevent the smallest insect from entering, and at the same time allow through ventilation. K. H. R.

We need some protectors for our dress sleeves. Take a pair of your husband's old cotton hose, cut the feet off, and draw the legs on over your sleeves; I think you will like them so well you will never make any of calico again.—Mrs. C. A. Davis, Bangor, Me.

Sources of Colds.

Many mothers appear to accept with resignation the repeated and violent colds from which their children suffer, as providential and unavoidable. A cold is by no means always due to exposure. Indigestion, constipation, a lack of scrupulous cleanliness, the unwise habit of sleeping in the underclothing worn during the day, unaired bed-chambers, all or any of these things may have far more to do with a child's tendency to cold than the keenest breath of the bracing Winter air.

Mother should understand it as fact, whether or not she can see why it should be, that numerous colds and sore throats are directly traceable to indigestion and errors in diet.
Quantities of greasy food, fried meats, pastry and the like, ill-ventilated rooms and continued constipation have to answer for many cases of croup and putrid sore throat. All these things weaken the system and render it far less able to resist changes of temperature. Every bedroom should have a thorough airing each day, more especially if several children are obliged to sleep together. This is to be avoided, if possible; if not, always lower a window slightly from the top, or, if this cannot be done, raise it from below. There is frequently bad air enough generated and breathed in the sleeping-apartment of small children to supply them all not only with colds, but with a sufficient number of so-called "malarious" diseases to last a year, perhaps longer.—Peterson's.

Some people call them wool Tricot. They cost only 12 1/2 c a yard, and are 36 inches wide.

If you'll stop to think a moment, you will know that a yard of cloth 36 inches wide could never be sold for 12 1/2 if it was all wool.

Of course no one says all wool; you are simply led to think so, and in that there isn't much difference, by the statement Wool Tricot.

We have them, and they are good enough at 12 1/2 c a yard, although they are made of cotton and wool with rather more of the first than the last.

Cunning little woolen socks for the babies, silk ones too, little kid hooties in white, russets, modes and black. All by themselves, with lots of pretty little woolen things just suited to the little folk.

Handsome heavy Chenille table covers, very heavily fringed, 6x4, came to the Linon section yesterday; there are 50 patterns among them, so the chief says.

We don't know how so much can be given for so little, but the price is only $2.50.

Another lot of stamped Trays has arrived, and among them are some beauties with pink borders and blue, 12 1/2 c as before.

Fashion.

Smooth felt hats, with a brim simply rounded with ribbon, and trimmed with a twist of velvet and lace or of spangled galloon, is the first choice for autumn. There are, also, many little bonnets made up of cloth to match the tailor costume. The cloth in such cases is fitted smoothly over the bonnet frame, and a border of velvet or spangled galloon in a harmonizing color finishes the edge, and the bonnet is completed by trimmings of jet or feathers. Fancy feathers have again been introduced, but the tendency is towards the use of ostrich tips in preference to any other trimmings. Velvet is used in ribbons, and by the piece, and is mixed with spangled gauzes, nets and the lightest laces. There are even flowers made of velvet, which are preferred to the more natural French flowers.—Helen Rowe, in Good Housekeeping.

There is close rivalry between the fashionable cape and the new jacket with shoulder drapery. Both styles are equally effective, whether developed independently or en suit.

Black garments on colored fabric are even more popular this year than last, for we have grown accustomed to the strong contrasts thus effected, and can admire their genuine beauty.

Old Greek is the proper style for the hair, nowadays. Cleopatra has said it: Bernhard Mrs. Potter, Langtry and Davenport have taken up the cry, and there is no style in us if we fail to adopt the Cleopatra coiffure for soirée, theatre, dinner and ball.

The "Galette," is a classic and fashionable mode for arranging the hair. It is carried round and round the head, and kept in place by a comb and several unique pins. From the face it rolls back plainly, in pompadour style.

EDWARD L. SMITH & CO.

MISS ROSSIER AS MISSIONARY.

The latest acquisition to the noble band of mission workers in our New England States, is that of Miss Hattie Rossier, well known to a large circle of friends in this city.

Miss Rossier was born in Montgomery Vt., Nov. 11th, 1856. Her father, the late John Daniel Rossier of this city, was a native of Rougemont, Switzerland and her mother was a Canadian of German and French extraction. The love for mission work was in no small degree inherited from her father, who was the first Protestant missionary to this country, and who devoted his whole life to mission work, laboring both in Canada and the United States. All of her childhood was spent amid scenes well calculated to develop, as they did, a spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice, for others. Her early educational training was received in the common schools of Worcester and was completed at "Grand Leign Institution," a mission in Canada. From her earliest childhood Miss Rossier had always cherished the desire to engage in the same noble calling as her father and, during her studies, always kept this end in view.

At the death of her father she was compelled to give up her studies. This was a severe blow but necessarily made it imperative that she should do something to support herself. So, with a heavy heart, she laid aside her books, as she then supposed, forever.

For a time she was employed at Burns undergar factory, and afterwards at Whitney's valentine works. But she was destined to fill some higher and more noble position.

An older sister conceived the idea that Hattie should have an education and so by mutual understanding, together they bent all their energies to achieve that one thing. By dint of close economy and hard work they managed to save enough from their scanty earnings to meet the expenses of a year's course at "Grand Leign." The first year at this school was brought to a sudden close in March by the destruction of the institution by fire, and she was compelled to return home. The next fall however, the institution had been partially rebuilt and by the financial assistance of her sister she was enabled to re-enter it once more and resume her studies. And thus the two girls struggled nobly on until success crowned their efforts.

Miss Rossier received her appointment to the mission station of Monterey, Mexico, from the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society, and on the 12th inst. left this city to begin her labors in that place. This mission is at present in charge of the Rev. Thos. Westrup and wife, but when Miss Rossier has learned the language, she will assume full control of the school.

The W. A. B. M. Society congratulates itself upon its good fortune in securing for this work so estimable a person as Miss Rossier. All who know her speak of her only in the most glowing terms. Her love for the work is intense—and her desire to be at work is only equalled by her deep sincerity and piety and should a kind Providence grant to bless her with physical health and strength we predict for her a brilliant future.

The Main Street Baptist Church, of which she was an active member, will feel its loss considerable, but will deem it an honor to have one of its members engaged in this blessed work. She was also an active member of the several societies connected with that church, particularly the "Christian Endeavor" and "King's Daughters."

It means something to be a missionary, something more than the expending of a few paltry dollars. To give up home and friends, the refined society of civilized life, hopes and prospects for the future, for a life in a foreign land, among a race alien in religion customs and language, to a young lady of refinement and culture is an undertaking that requires the greatest self-sacrifice and devotion of which the human heart is capable. R.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Rev. E. W. Phillips was ordained and installed pastor of Hope Church, Monday evening. The council of representatives from the Congregational churches of the city met in the afternoon and organized with Rev. W. T. Sleeper as moderator and Rev. John E. Hurlburt as scribe. After the reading of the portion of the church records relating to the call and the examination of the candidate the council went into secret session. In the evening the program, published last week in LIGHT, was carried out. The scribe reported that the council had found the call and acceptance regular and the candidate sound in doctrine. At the close of the service the pastor announced that the church is free from debt and that $600 has been raised as a beginning of a building fund. The chapel has been removed to the rear of the lot, the foundations for a new church have been laid and as soon as $2,000 more can be raised, the building will be begun.

The autumn meeting of the Worcester Central Conference of Orthodox Congregational Churches was held Tuesday in the Salem Street Church. The conference includes the churches in Worcester, Auburn, Berlin, Boylston, Clinton, Holden, Leicester, Oxford, Paxton, Princeton, Rutland, Shrewsbury, Sterling and West Boylston, all of which were represented. The exercises began in the forenoon at 10.15 with a half hour's devotional service, conducted by Rev. John E. Dodge of Sterling. After Rev. J. J. Lansing had extended the welcome of the church to the conference, the regular session began with Lucius P. Goddard moderator, A. L. Kneeland, scribe. Rev. S. S. Mathews, the field secretary, spoke on the work of the new West Education Commission, whose work is largely among the Mormons. Rev. Alfred Noy, secretary of the Massachusetts reformatory at Concord gave an address on "Our young men in prison," in which he stated that, in most of the cases, had the young men had better training in their youth they would never have been there and that the liquor saloons were almost always the cause of their downfall. At noon dinner was served by the ladies of the church. The afternoon session began with an address by Rev. George H. Gutterston on "The Madura Mission of the American board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions." Rev. A. Z. Conrad, Ph. D., of Old South Church, gave an address on "The effect of modern Biblical criticism" which was followed by a discussion in which Rev. Dr. Davis of Union Church, Rev. Dr. A. E. P. Perkins, Rev. C. M. Southgate of Pilgrim Church and Rev. Dr. Mears of Piedmont Church took part. In the evening, after a praise service there were reports from the recent meeting of the American Board in Pittsfield, by Rev. Dr. Perkins and Rev. I. L. Willcox of Park Church.

CENTRAL.—The evening choir of Central Church will give a song service Sunday evening, the subject being "Trust in God." Rev. J. L. Jenkins D. D., of Pittsfield will deliver the address. The following program will be given: Prelude Offertoire in F B-flat, evening hymn, Buck; Psalm XIII, Mendelssohn, Solo by Miss Lois Thompson; Response, "All that God may give," Richter; "Lead kind light, Dykes.

PILGRIM.—Another of the "novelties" that the Ladies Aid Society of Pilgrim Church are becoming famous for was the "huskin'" at Elmwood Farm, Millbury, through the courtesy of Mr. F. P. Knowles, the proprietor, last Tuesday evening. Kilburn's three mammoth "busses were filled, which, with a number of private conveyances, carried about one hundred and twenty-five to the scene of action. A bountiful farmer's supper rewarded their arduous (?) labors and bushels of fun made the whole affair a great success, beside netting a neat sum to the Ladies Aid treasury.

GRACE.—The annual banquet of the Epworth League occurred last Tuesday in the vestry. The windows were hung with curtains and the floor set with elegant tables. Rev. John Galbraith, who was instrumental in starting this league, was its guest and before supper was led to the Young Men's Room and shown a life-size crayon picture of himself, which has been procured to hang upon the wall of that room.

The exercises were in charge of A. S. Roe, toastmaster, and the following toasts were responded to. During his remarks he expressed the hope that the union of Methodism might come through the young people of the Epworth Leagues. "The League, Its Present." L. J. Pentecost. He reviewed its history, showing what a benefit it has been to the church. "The League, Its Present," Frank J. Metcalf. He called attention to the duty of each member to do his part that the work be well done. "The League, Its Future," Mrs. Nellie M. Moulton. What we will do depends on personal piety and consecration. "Dead but not Forgotten" Mrs. A. S. Roe responded by singing Tennyson's "Break." "Our duty to the Church," Rev. W. T. Worth. This he expressed in two words, mutual helpfulness. "The Ladies" Charles E. Squiers. They can do much in the department of Mercy and Help. "Our Membership," Miss Alice G. Arnold. She plead for fully developed, well rounded and consecrated helpers. "Old Friends," Rev. John Galbraith. Many he saw around him, but some had gone to the spirit land.

Before supper a double quartet sang a

Greeting Song. They also sang during the evening. The double quartet was composed of Misses Mabel Shorey, Nellie Layng, Flora Minor, Annie E. Bates, Messrs. W. C. Healy, W. Worth, L. W. Farwell, W. A. Pentecost. The exercises closed by all joining to sing "Look I up, Lift Up," word, by Mrs. A. S. Roe, sung to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne." Rev. Wm. Pentecost pronounced the benediction. One hundred tickets were issued and every place was taken.

The young ladies of Trinity church connected with Helping Circle of the Kings Daughters conducted a sale of fancy articles last Monday evening. The proceeds were about twenty-five dollars. A musical and literary program was also given.

Y. P. S. C. E.

At a meeting of the executive board of the Local Union held Monday evening in the Y. M. C. A. parlor, it was decided to hold the next meeting of the Union at the Dewey Street Baptist Church, Thursday, Nov. 5. Rev. Phillip A. Nordell, of New London, Conn., will speak at this meeting on "Interdenominational Fellowship." Invitations to be present will be sent to the Epworth Leagues and the Free Will Baptist Union. There will also be the usual contest for the banner.

A committee, consisting of Willis E. Sibley of the Plymouth Church society, Dr. Bristol of the Millbury Congregational society and Mr. Lingley of the Pleasant Street Baptist society, was appointed to revise the constitution. One of the principal revisions to be made will be the changing of the date of the annual election from October to September.

It was voted that the Union will send a delegate to the state convention which will be held at Springfield Nov. 17 and 18.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Park Church observed its fourth anniversary Thursday evening with an oyster supper, to which about twenty-five members sat down. After the supper the roll was read and toasts were responded to by Rev. L. L. Wilcox, Louis B. Osborn, Mrs. S. M. Bellows, Elliott Brigham and Louis C. Chase. A social rounded out the evening's pleasure.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

The new St. Anne's Church, which occupies on the Normal School hill one of the most imposing sites of any church in the city, was dedicated last Sunday. Services have been held in the chapel for several years, but it was only until last week that the auditorium was completed. When the services began Sunday morning at 10:30 there was a very large congregation present. In the front pews were seated a number of invited guests, including Mayor Francis A. Harrington and other members of the city government. The service began with a procession around the outside and then about the inside of the church. After Bishop O'Reilly had blessed and dedicated the edifice the procession returned to the sacristy and soon after solemn high mass was begun, at which the officers were Rt. Rev. Mgr. Griffin, D. D., celebrant; Rev. R. J. Johnson, Gate of Heaven Church, South Boston, deacon; Rev. John Conway of Winchendon, sub-deacon; Rev. Eugene F. Brosnahan of St. Anne's, master of ceremonies. The bishop sat on a dias at the gospel side of the altar, attended by Rev. M. A. O'Kane, S. J., president of the Holy Cross College and Rev. Walter Smith of Springfield. Very Rev. John J. Power preached the sermon from the text "For what reason thinkest thou that former times are better than they are now, for this manner of question is foolish." In the evening, when solemn vespers were sung the church was again crowded. The sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Beavan of Holyoke.

UNIVERSALIST.

The members of All Soul's Universalist Church occupied a portion of their new church, corner of Woodland and Norwood Streets, last Sunday for the first time. The chapel and lecture rooms have been completed and the auditorium will be finished so that the dedication can take place in the middle of November. Sunday, Rev. F. A. Gray preached a sermon appropriate to the occasion from the text "Behold, all things are become new."

BAPTIST.

The second anniversary of the Adams Square Baptist Church was observed last week Friday evening by a social gathering, at which besides the regular attendants at the church, there was present a large delegation from the Lincoln Square Church. Brief remarks were made during the evening by the pastor, Rev. D. W. Hoyt, Rev. J. J. Miller of the Lincoln Square Church and Deacons Leach and White. During the two years the membership has doubled and the chapel has been considerably enlarged.

A meeting of the Baptist City Mission Board was held last Sunday evening at the Main Street Baptist Church, with a very large attendance. Rev. Horace J. White, pastor of the Pleasant Street Baptist Church, read the scriptural lesson from Matt. xxii, 14. Rev. George C. Craft, pastor of the First Baptist Church offered the prayer, after which Rev. C. H. Pendleton, pastor of the Main Street Baptist Church, introduced Deacon J. P. Cheney, Jr., to speak on the topic, "The Work Committed to Baptist Hands in this City." Rev. Guy F. Wheeler spoke for the Quinsigamond branch. Rev. Darius H. Stoddard of the Dewey Street Church spoke on the fraternal relations between the Baptist churches and Rev. A. Bunker, D. D., a missionary to Burmah told about his foreign experiences.

Y. M. C. A.

The Association course of entertainments will begin next Thursday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra Club, assisted by Miss Laura Burnham, soprano and Mr. John Lloyd, tenor. Miss Burnham was one of the soloists at the recent festival. The sale of tickets has been unusually large this year.

The junior department is progressing. The reading and game room is in working order and is greatly appreciated by the boys. The membership of the boys' gymnasium class numbers about 35.

The annual meeting of the board of directors will be held Tuesday evening when the year's reports will be read and the president, two vice-presidents, treasurer and recording secretary will be elected.

The women's auxiliary committees have been organized with the following chairmen: Reception committee, Mrs. H. S. Moulton; entertainment, Mrs. A. C. Monroe; membership, Mrs. J. L. Alexander; on junior work, Mrs. Lafayette Robbins; on rooms, Mrs. Albert Curtis; visiting of sick, Mrs. Stevens.

Chas. D. Stewart will lead the morning meeting tomorrow and Principal Thompson of the Ledger Street School will speak to the boys at three o'clock.

The educational classes meet this week and will begin next week the regular sessions.

Origin of Toronto.

A learned paper read recently before one of our antiquarian societies, deals entertainingly with the origin of the name Toronto. The writer traces the word back to the boastful lips of the Hurons, who, when they wish to tell that they were great in numbers, or had an abundance of corn or fish or other good things, said "Toronto." In the early days the name was applied to a place 50 miles north of the city, but at length was attached to this locality. Toronto, then, means abundance, or greatness, and henceforth we will use its sonorous syllables to express both our present and anticipated importance.

The Scales on a Hair.

If you look at a human hair under a microscope you will find that its surface is formed of successive overlapping scales. The bristles of the hog bear much resemblance to the human hair, though their diameter is greater and the tilelike scales are much finer. Sheep's hair has much coarser scales. It is owing to the existence of these scales that a schoolboy is able by a peculiar process to tell which is the tip and which the other end of a hair, rolling it between the finger and thumb. Thus manipulated, the hair always travels in the direction of the base, because the edges of the scales prevent it from going the other way. —Interview in Washington Star.

Music From Insects.

The notes of the katydid are perhaps as familiar as any and have a certain fascination, the sounds taking on various inflections and meanings. They are produced by rubbing the inner surface of the hind legs against the outer surface of the front wings—fiddling, in fact. When the male cricket sings in the hearth it raises its fore wings and scrapes them against its hind ones. Even the butterfly makes a sound audible at some distance, certain species have been heard to utter a clicking sound.—St. Paul Dispatch.

Universalist Convention.

The Biennial assemblage of representative Universalists in this city is worthy of much more space and attention than LIGHT can give. An American national gathering of any kind is noteworthy and, possibly, Worcester, considering her size, gets her share of such bodies. It is only a little while since Plymouth Church held the national Congregationalist conference and, now, within a stone's throw from Plymouth, in the handsome Pleasant Street edifice, gather Universalists from all parts of the Union. The convention calls for about one hundred and fifty delegates to which number must be added fully three times as many visitors, the most of whom the Universalists of the city aim to care for. When it is known that James E. Dennis is care taker in chief, we may conclude that few visitors are left without lodgings. The president of the body was the Hon. Hosea W. Parker of Claremont, N. H. The first meeting was held, Tuesday evening, when the Rev. Henry Greene of Lowell preached. Wednesday came the first formal assemblage. Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. Dr. Gunnison of this city, assisted by the Rev. Francis A. Gray of All Souls. The most prominent members of the denomination as Dr.'s Sawyer, Miner, Emerson, Blanchard, Capen were present. The sermon of the morning was by Dr. I. M. Attwood, president of the Theological School in Canton, N. Y. The reports of the trustees show an increase of membership and in property. In a word the convention was a pleasurable and successful gathering, alike creditable to the church at large and to the local churches that received and entertained. It was a novel idea to have Caterer Yeaw serve dinners in the Rink; but it was nevertheless a good one. When Worcester sets out to be hospitable, she cuts no half way figure.

Books are true levelers. They give to all who faithfully use them the society, the spiritual presence of the best and greatest of our race.—Channing.

VOLAPÜK.

I desire all who have been following the series of Volapük articles in this paper to send me their names and address.

New interest concerning Volapük has been aroused by the lessons being published by papers throughout the country, and an united effort is all that is needed to acquaint the people in general with its beauties and advantages.

The greatest obstacle to the adoption of the language in America is the idea, born of Yankee conceit, that English is or is rapidly becoming the Universal language.

We forgot that only about one hundred millions speak English. We forgot that three hundred and sixty millions speak Chinese. We forgot that the French have a better right to consider their language universal because it is the diplomatic language of all nations.

We forgot that the German loves his fatherland and all connected with it, too well to give up his Dutch.

The truth is there never can be a universal language, and that Volapük, divested of all nationality, of all peculiarity of race, of all anomalies, and difficulties which are the accompaniment of growth, is the best medium of inter-communication between those using different mother tongues. Not only for this but because of its grammatical regularity and simplicity, it forms the best comparison with all native languages enabling its possessor to become thoroughly acquainted with his own and other tongues.

THE LITTLE MEN WANT THEM.

It is the prettiest sight in the world to see "little men" of 4, 5, 6 and 10 years trying on the cute little CAPE OVERCOATS specially designed for them.

Somebody had the boys' delight in their mind when this pretty coat was fashioned for them.

If you could be in our "Boys'" department for an hour, you would be more than amused with the proud air of the little fellows when the garment is put on.

There is just one difficulty about them, and that is the trouble in taking them off—for the little fellows don't want to part with them even to try on another.

It would seem as though the "little men" grew inches when they looked in the glass and saw the "Nobby Coats" with capes to them just like the men's."

For "Little Men," 4, 5, 6 years, these cute CAPE OVERCOATS are made from chevots, homespun and plaided beavers, and they can be had for $3, $4, $5, $6, with a tip-top one for $5.

As the boys grow a little older 10 and 12 perhaps, the price goes up from $5 to $15, and Chinchilla is added to the list of cloths.

From 13 to 18 years, the prices range from $5 to $20 and Kerseys, Meltons, Chinchillas and Tweeds are the cloths used.

For young men, we have an OVERCOAT that could not be told from custom work of the very best.

The prices range from $10 to $25. Some of them are made from the celebrated "Carr's Melton.

They are made double-breasted, in perfect seal brown shade, wide collars, elegant shapes, full lap seams, silk and wool lined. It is beyond all question true that in every way these coats are equal in all ways to the regular custom made.

The DOUBLE-BREASTED STYLES are right this year for young men.

HAVE YOU SEEN THEM!

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1891.

No. 9

Hath he not always treasures, always friends,
The good, great man? Two treasures,—love and light,
And calm thoughts, equal as infants' breath,
And three last friends, more sure than day or night,— Himself, his Maker, and the Angel Death.

—Coleridge.

Next week it will all be over. The vote will have been taken and we shall, as a state, be tranquil again; for a short time.

Then follows, hard after, the city campaign, if possible more animated than that of the state. The issues are nearer our doors and they excite all the more interest.

The contest for the Presidency of the United States will follow so soon that from this date onward for more than a year, elections of one kind or another will more than fill the air.

This has been a week of rallies. Monday night it was as though a score of Fourth of July had been crowded into that one evening. How the Democratic crowd filled up Front Street and Main as far as Mechanics Hall and then poured into that room and into Washburn, till a squirt even at the speakers to a late comer was an impossibility.

But one story is good only till another is told and Tuesday evening came the next one. Without any lurid additions, in sober thoughtfulness and earnestness, the Republicans filled those same places and had their say. We have had, within the week, governors, past, present and future and in all sorts of moods. Governor Long is clearly in the indicative, Russell, in the subjunctive, with an if, unless he be in the infinitive. "To be or not to be," while Allen leans toward the potential.

Thursday night came the Peoples Party with their candidates and they put at the head a Winning name to begin with, so whatever happens, they are bound to Winn. To hear Edward Bellamy on any subject would be a source of pleasure to all who have read Look ing Backwards, but just now his vision is rather forward than to the rear. However, the time is considerably remote when mankind will be willing to sink its identity in any kind of communistic project.

Next Monday, the Prohibitionists close the campaign with an address in Mechanics Hall by Sam Small of Georgia. Names are frequently misnomers, sometimes given by the rule of contrariety and in Small's case the latter principle seems to have been applied, for however much many of his hearers may differ from him in methods, the most of them will accord to him ability of the highest order and resplendent oratorical genius.

The recent attempt to serve a summons on Secretary Blaine as he passed through Baltimore is an excellent illustration of the long continuance of evil deeds. This attempt was at the instance of certain holders of Confederate bonds. Can history furnish another parallel instance of animation in a long laid ghost? And in Baltimore too? It was not quite the 19th of April but if the Secretary had been found it would have delayed him. Could another Northern city furnish an officer who would even try to serve such a writ?

The late session of the World Conference of Methodists in Washington was notable in many respects, but preeminently in this, that there was no wrangle over doctrines. While our Congregational brethren are disturbed over Andover matters and our Presbyterians friends lay charges of heresy at Prof. Briggs' door, the Methodists spend two weeks in conference and do not mention minor points of doctrine. Truly they are concerned over weightier matters. Methods of church work and plans for greater denominational unity with unflinching devotion to the Bible engrossed the time.

It is just possible that our Worcester people did not appreciate the magnitude of the gathering that occupied the First Universalist Church, last week. It was representative of America. Some of the most noted men and women in the denomination met there and were heard in debate, for this was the biennial business meeting. Who would suspect in listening to Dr. Miner's energetic utterances that he was far past seventy? After more than a half century of spiritual warfare he is yet ready to break a lance with the youngest contestant. His successor at the head of Tufts College, Dr. Capen, is a man of excellent presence while Dr. Sawyer, who is many years beyond the allotted years of the Psalmist, is still seen and heard. Dr. Emerson of The Leader is the peer of any speaker and commands a hearing always. Finally, more than any other denomination, the Universalists have opened the mouths of women and the results more than justify the deed.

The writer of the following, a teacher of many years experience, is entitled to the most careful hearing. Her words are truth itself.

Blighted Promise.

EDITOR LIGHT:

Permit an old resident of Worcester, one who has watched her progress with unspeakable pride, though at the same time noting the outcome of her schools with pained solicitude, to ask you to bring forward a suggestion. It is this: That the way be opened for manual training in our schools. Opened with no unnecessary delay. We cannot afford to put these vital matters off. Who of us who read the Police and Criminal Court records cannot point to one and another of the "cases" sent up for "three months," "six months," "a year," a term of years, whom he does not remember as a bright boy, an honor to his class in school. I, an old teacher, can number them by hundreds. I helped to stimulate their active young brains, but, under an iron rule, I also helped to dwarf the instinctive tendency that dominates the leanings of every child, the tendency to educate his hands. All action save drawing and writing teachers must prohibit. What! have a workshop in the cellar? Our schools are for education. Manual training is best taught at home. But how many of our school children have homes in which this is possible? And how many men and women in our city would not find it irksome, the sitting upright and doing of pure brain work, day after day, five hours each day, for ten months in the year? But the children get their compensation for this outrage upon their crying needs when the school hours are over. Fingers, which under a supervision of common sense would be busy with jack-knife, chisel, saw and glue-pot, with "something attempted, something done" to "gain a night's repose," get light and pilfer. They must do something. The boys like to boast to each other of their exploits in this line. They like to get into the saloons and ape the doings of their elders. As they go on into manhood with those useless hands, what is there for them? We read of them as brawlers, fighters, burglars, sneak thieves. Editor LIGHT, I ask you to call for a reformed system of education. Worcester people may hold up their hands and cry out over these breakers of the law as examples of inborn depravity, but Worcester people are themselves the criminals if they do not set about remedying through the schools this terrible waste of the possibilities which lie before Worcester's young humanity.

A Rival of the Yosemite.

In the vast Sierra wilderness far to the southward of the famous Yosemite Valley, there is a yet grander valley of the same kind. It is situated on the south fork of King's River, above the most extensive groves and forests of the giant sequoia, and beneath the shadow of the highest mountains in the range, where the cañons are deepest and the snow-laden peaks are crowded most closely together. It is called the Big King's River Cañon, or King's River Yosemite, and is reached by way of Visalia, the nearest point on the Southern Pacific Railroad, from which the distance is about forty-five miles, or by the Keasarge Pass from the east side of the range. It is about ten miles long, half a mile wide, and the stupendous rocks of purplish gray granite that form the walls are from 2500 to 5000 feet in height, while the depth of the valley below the general surface of the mountain mass from which it has been carved is considerably more than a mile. Thus it appears that this new Yosemite is longer and deeper, and lies embedded in grander mountains, than the well known Yosemite of the Merced. Their general characters, however are wonderfully alike, and they bear the same relationship to the fountains of the ancient glaciers above them.—John Muir, in the November Century.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known American or British writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every two weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Oct. 31,

That magnificent offer for War Memoirs, with Cosmopolitan and LIGHT, is still in force. Viz., $5 pays for LIGHT, Cosmopolitan and a set of Grant's, Sherman's, Sheridan's or McClellan's Memoirs.

The world wide characteristics of the English language are well illustrated in a copy of the North China Daily News, published in Shanghai and laid on LIGHT's desk by Mr. J. B. Crocker. Just think of a daily English paper, in that far away heathen land. No wonder that Greater Britain goes around the world.

If any reader of LIGHT knows of a former Worcester resident, still interested in his old home to whom, a sample copy of this paper would be a pleasure, please send in the name to this office. Once a week visits from Worcester ought to delight many a far away home.

Why not complete your file of LIGHT? Today it is possible, tomorrow may be too late. There are now papers sufficient to supply every back number; but they will not last indefinitely. An early call will insure your set complete.

AN INTERNATIONAL GATHERING OF CHRISTIANS AT WORK.

The sixth annual assembly of Christian Workers, chiefly those in the United States and Canada, will be held in the First Congregational Church, Washington, D. C., for seven days, beginning Thursday, Nov. 5th. It is under the direction of a committee representing pastors, evangelists, and city mission workers in the United States and Canada and will bring together a large number of such workers. The last annual convention at Hartford, Conn., was attended by at least a thousand ministers of different denominations and as many as three thousand other delegates.

It is not for any particular organization or association, but for all evangelical Christians, engaged or interested in various forms of Christian effort, the object being that such Christians at work may have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with each other, comparing methods and plans of work and receiving from one another hints, suggestions and like aid, in order that they may thus add to their usefulness. Members of all Christian denominations are eligible as delegates and any Christians who are interested or engaged in practical Christian effort, evangelistic work, Christian Endeavor, city mission or special church agencies among the classes not reached by the ordinary ministrations of the church are invited to be present as delegates, with the privilege of participating in the discussions and obtaining reduced entertainment and railroad rates. Full particulars with partial list of subjects, speakers etc., may be obtained by addressing the secretary, Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Rev. Laurence Perry has changed his mind and will not become the pastor of the Lake View Church. Last Summer a call, which did not state what his salary would be, was extended to him by the church, he accepted it and has occupied the pulpit since June. The question of the salary to be paid him remained undecided until last week, when the church voted to offer him an amount which was less than a $1000. Mr. Perry at once declined to accept the church's offer. If he had accepted the ordination and installation would have taken place last Monday. The church will now search for a new pastor and will probably offer $1000 if the right man can be secured. The church is quite small and cannot pay a large salary but, probably, if it had very earnestly desired that Mr. Perry should remain as pastor, an effort would have been made to raise the $1000.

John F. Briery has been elected superintendent of the Pilgrim Sunday School in place of W. O. Bement, resigned. He is also president of the Endeavor Society.

PARK CHURCH. Rev. I. L. Wilcox entertained the Park Church Society at his home, 72 West Street, Thursday evening.

The regular bi-monthly meeting of the Local Union will be held next Thursday evening, Nov. 2, at the Dewey Street Baptist Church. Rev. Dr. Phillip A. Nordell of New London, Conn., will be the principal speaker and will talk on "Interdenominational Fellowship." The Epworth Leagues have also been invited to be present. There will be the usual contest for the Union banner.

CHURCH CHOIRS.

At the rehearsal of the Salem Street Congregational Church last week Friday evening, Clarence J. Harris played his new composition, "Memories of Home," mentioned in last week's LIGHT. Rev. I. J. Lansing gave a talk on "The Voice as an Agent of Expression," which is the first of a series, of which the second was given last evening.

UNIVERSALIST.

The Ladies' Social Circle of the First Universalist Church will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary by appropriate exercises in church parlors next Tuesday afternoon. Social in the evening.

Y. M. C. A.

Members of the Junior department will conduct the boys meeting at three tomorrow. Rev. E. W. Phillips will address the men's meeting at four o'clock and the choir of the Webster Square Church will sing.

The annual meeting of the board of directors, which was to have been held Tuesday evening, was postponed on account of the Republican rally until next Monday evening.

The educational classes began their regular sessions this week. In spite of the fact that each member must this year deposit a dollar on entrance to the classes, the membership is as large as it has ever been, one hundred and fifty being in attendance.

BAPTIST.

The new edifice of the Mt. Olive Baptist Church on John Street was dedicated last week Friday evening. The exercises began with an organ prelude, followed by the prayer of invocation by Rev. D. W. Hoyt of Adams Square Baptist church, a selection by the choir, and the singing of a hymn, read by Rev. Mr. Hoyt; Scripture reading by Rev. J. J. Miller of Lincoln Square Church; solo by Mrs. R. H. Tillman of Mt. Olive Church; addresses by Rev. George G. Craft of the first Baptist Church, Rev. J. J. Miller, Deacon C. F. Rugg and George C. Whitney on the objects and uses of houses of worship and how to utilize them for the salvation of souls; dedicatory prayer by Rev. D. H. Stoddard of Dewey Street Church. Rev. H. J. White of Pleasant Street Church made an appeal for aid, stating that the new church cost $3,500 and that over $2,000 had already been raised by the members of the church and their friends. A collection was taken. The congregation sang a hymn, read by Rev. E. B. Haskell of the South Baptist Church and Rev. Guy F. Wheeler of the Quinsigamond Chapel pronounced the benediction. The new building is of wood, of Gothic design and will seat 300 people. It contains, beside a church proper, a vestry, prayer meeting room and ladies' parlor. The membership of the society numbers nearly one hundred.

Services have been held in the Mt. Olive Church every evening this week, save Saturday. Last Sunday forenoon, Rev. Wm. T. Dixon of Brooklyn, N. Y., preached; in the afternoon Rev. I. J. Lansing of the Salem Street Church preached as did also Rev. J. H. Carter, D. D., of Boston in the evening. Monday evening there was preaching by Rev. F. D. George of the Free Baptist Church and Tuesday evening, by Rev. G. H. S. Hell of Zion A. M. E. Church. Wednesday afternoon and evening the quarterly meeting of the first district of the New England Baptist Association was held at the church.

In the afternoon a business session was held at which officers were elected as follows: President, Rev. Mr. Jeter; Vice President, Rev. B. K. Butler of Providence, R. I.; Secretary, Rev. S. H. Brown; Treasurer, Rev. Peter Smith of Boston; Executive Committee, Dr. Carter, Rev. J. O. Johnson of Providence, R. I., and Rev. Mr. Jeter. George W. Tyler, who is to be pastor of the Shiloh Baptist Church at Hartford, a candidate for ordination, was examined. He passed the examination successfully. In the evening the ordination service took place. Rev. E. E. Jackson of Hartford preached the sermon of the evening and Rev. G. H. Carter conducted the ordination service. Thursday evening there was preaching by Rev. E. P. Greenidge of Bethel A. M. E. Church. Friday evening there was a Sabbath School concert and address by Isaac Mason.

Origin of Toronto.

A learned paper read recently before one of our antiquarian societies, deals entertainingly with the origin of the name Toronto. The writer traces the word back to the boastful lips of the Hurons, who, when they wish to tell that they were great in numbers, or had an abundance of corn or fish or other good things, said "Torontoon." In the early days the name was applied to a place 50 miles north of the city, but at length was attached to this locality. Toronto, then, means abundance, or greatness, and henceforth we will use its sonorous syllables to express both our present and anticipated importance.

The Scales on a Hair.

If you look at a human hair under a microscope you will find that its surface is formed of successive overlapping scales. The bristles of the hog bear much resemblance to the human hair, though their diameter is greater and the tilelike scales are much finer. Sheep's hair has much coarser scales. It is owing to the existence of these scales that a schoolboy is able by a peculiar process to tell which is the tip and which the other end of a hair, rolling it between the finger and thumb. Thus manipulated, the hair always travels in the direction of the base, because the edges of the scales prevent it from going the other way. — Interview in Washington Star.

Albert Tolman.

When the Rev. Calvin Stebbins and the Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, on Saturday last preceded the procession into the Church of the Unity, they were performing as honorable an office as ever fell to their lot. In the casket was borne all that was mortal of one of Nature's noblemen, a man whose presence was ever a benediction, whom to meet was to insure pleasant impressions for the day. Nearly two years have passed since he walked our streets and our last meeting with him was at the corner of Main and Exchange. Together we moved toward the north end, remarking on the changes that his long life had noted in Worcester's growth. Gently down the declivity of life, he passed to his final reward.

He was born where Revolutionary memories were rife, for it was in Lincoln, Dec. 23, 1803, that he first saw the light and, two days after, his father removing to Concord, he and his became a Christmas gift to that ancient and historic town. The stock, both paternal and maternal was of the staunchest New England character. His father, Elisha, tracing his descent from Thomas Tolman who came to Dorchester in 1834, in the ship, Mary and John from England. His mother was Lucretia Pike of equally early pedigree. Mr. Tolman received the drill of the schools, including a preparation for college, but instead of classic halls, he became familiar with shops where handicraft was taught. He learned carriage making. Coming to Worcester, many years ago, he carried on his business on Exchange Street. He early won the respect of his fellow citizens and was made a selectman in the latter days of the old town of Worcester. In all local enterprises that have contributed to Worcester's good, he has been conspicuous. He was one of the earliest members of the Society of Antiquity and, for several years, was a vice president. His death took place at his home, 18 Catharine street, Oct. 21 at 4.30 a. m. He leaves two children, Mrs. Mary L. Bradt of Huntington, Florida and Mr. Edward F. Tolman of this city. He was twice married, first to Miss Susanna R. Hunstable and second to Miss Olive N. Flagg of Sterling. The first wife died in 1858, the second in 1864. Mr. Tolman was noted for his interest in all humane measures, being one of those who helped the negro to liberty, in ante bellum days. When the High School was organized and a black girl was denied admission on account of her color, he brought his associates to his way of thinking by saying, "If you object to A. B. on account of the color of her face, I shall certainly oppose the entrance of C. D. because her hair is red." A laugh and proper action followed.

The funeral was an impressive one, attended by many of our city's most prominent and representative people.

The pall bearers were Hon. George F. Hoar, Mayor Francis A. Harrington, Stephen Salisbury, A. N. Currier, Albert Curtis, E. B. Crane, Dexter Rice and George W. Russell.

Certainly no worthier subject ever called forth appreciative words from minister's lips than those uttered by Messrs Stebbins and Hale. The well filled sanctuary bore testimony to the estimate in which Worcester citizens held Albert Tolman. "He rests from his labors but his works do follow him." The burial was in Rural cemetery.

DEAR LIGHT, Your last number filled my soul with sadness and sorrow in the announcement of the departure from earth of the cherished friends of long ago. The gentle tender nature of Albert Tolman made his life a benediction of blessedness to all who knew him; and his departure filled with grief the hearts of all who loved him, because they knew him. Way back in the thirties, a fellow boarder with him, we sat together at Mrs. Phelps' table, on Pearl street, where now stands the Post Office, and passed many an hour in hard fought battles over the chess-board; and so I came to know him and love him as an elder brother. And though the decrees of Fate have banished me from the enjoyment of his society of late, whenever I have met him, I have received a most cordial greeting, and assurance of abiding friendship. To those who have enjoyed daily intercourse with him, and been blessed by his large knowledge acquired by his great reading and deep thinking, and by the tender sympathies of his kindly nature, his departure will leave an aching void, soothed only by the memories of all he was to them.

Another flower upon thy grave.

Another tribute of love to thee.

Kind-hearted, tender, loving, brave,

Pure model of Christianity.

George S. Barton I knew well in former years as a thriving spirit of business energy, and of mechanical ingenuity, that made him friend of all who came in connection with him in business or social life, and his sudden exit from life will be a great loss, not only to his immediate friends, but to the whole community at large. George Evans is remembered as an old resident though he has been absent for many years. And I may well say, your last number was one of sadness.

Truly yours, H.

Oct. 25, 1891.

To North Adams.

Notwithstanding the snow of the preceding morning, Saturday, the 24th inst., was a beautiful day. The air was a trifle keen, suggestive of approaching Winter, but the sun shone and ozone was plentiful. The Fitchburg railroad offers to him who loves scenery an unrivalled opportunity to see nature in her very happiest guise. To the rich green of Summer, has succeeded the variegated yellow and crimson of Autumn. There are thousands of tourists who take the trip through eastern Massachusetts for no other reason than just to see the hillsides and tops clad in their gorgeous attire. All the way brilliant hues prevail, but it is not till we reach Wendell that we are in the very midst of the splendor. There is only a brief wait at Gardner, and then on the main line, we are off for the mountain and the Fore. The villages, like all those in Massachusetts, seem to be thriving, but for these we care less than for the country side. We do our best to see both sides but the south side of the track presents the more variety. A casual remark, in passing through Shelburne Falls, as to the location of Arms Academy and the principalship of Mr. Frederick Tupper, formerly of the High School, draws forth sundry unsolicited information from a middle aged lady concerning churches, academy and cemetery, saying, "My first husband is buried there; only the other day I was repeating some verses." The danger of the repeating of those lines concerning the late Mr. Bedott, caused a sudden retreat on our part. Much beautiful scenery has been lost in a life time, through enforced listening to alleged poetry. The only way is to turn from it at once. The Deerfield valley, the scene of so much interest in the days of Indian depredation is still "As fair as a garden of the gods" not to the eyes of famished Rebel hordes, but to those of any and all tourists who go this way. The mountain, under which we pass, is one complete mass of yellow, save as, now and then, a tinge of green relieves the effect. A ride over rather than under would be more inspiring; but this the time will not admit. On the other side of the mountain, North Adams affords a dinner and an hour's rest and then comes the return, in reverse order, another half day of visual delight, leaving on the mind ineffaceable images of Autumnal glories. All the year round, the Fitchburg road has a source of delight to its patrons in the variety and extent of nature's beauties through which it passes. An excursion over it is always timely and diverting.

Head-ache Due to Defective Vision.

Do you wear eye-glasses? Do they fit you? That is a question which can be answered satisfactorily only by a competent oculist. Head-aches are very often caused by a condition of the eye known as astigmatism. Many times persons so afflicted resort to the use of nauseating drugs, which tends to aggravate rather than alleviate the disagreeable symptoms. A prominent writer in a recent number of the Popular Science Monthly states that well-authenticated cases of insanity have been traced to long-continued eye-strain. It has been remarked that a greater number of people wear glasses at the present time than in former years. This is due to the great advance made in science. Years ago the only relief to be had from eye strain caused by astigmatism, was in the use of colored glasses, which sooner or later worked injury to the eye, though giving temporary relief. Where formerly but a dozen different combinations of glasses were possible, today there is no limit to the number. A pair of glasses that will fit one person may not be suitable for any other in the world. Impaired vision and often permanent loss of sight, are frequently the result of ill fitting glasses. The Boston Optical Company, of which Dr. Draper, a physician of recognized standing, is the local representative, will make a free examination of any case of defective eye-sight, and furnish glasses as low as is consistent with good workmanship. The company's office is at 545 Main Street, Franklin Square.

If to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches and poor men's cottages, prince's palaces. He is a good divine that follows his own instructions: I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than to be one of twenty to follow mine own teaching.

Cornell.

There is probably no college in the country where such broad and extensive work is done in Bible study as at Cornell where for several years from five to ten courses have been given annually under the direction of the Cornell University Christian Association. These courses are carefully arranged by a committee from the association who confer with members of the faculty and secure their assistance in conducting the classes. Last year between two and three hundred students were regular attendants on these classes and a large number attended irregularly. Most of the classes are held on Sunday but one or two are given during the week. For the present year the work of supervision is in the hands of Mr. Floyd N. Loveland, '93, who has devoted much time to the arrangement of the various sections and has announced the best courses ever presented. The list of courses for the year is as follows:

1. General Old Testament Course. This course aims at a comprehensive and fundamental knowledge of the Old Testament, as preliminary for future studies. This course will be given by Prof. H. S. Jacoby.

2. The Lives and Times of Christ and the Apostles.

3. The Books of Samuel. This course is given for women only and is in charge of Mrs. President Adams.

4. The Life of Christ according to John. This will be one of the best of the courses and will be under the direction of Mrs. E. K. Hooker. It will be conducted on the Inductive Method and will give a detailed study of the life and personal character of Christ, aiming to come in contact with him as a friend and example.

5. The Career and Character of Paul, as shown in the Acts of the Apostles and in the letters of Paul. Prof. Brainard G. Smith.

6. The Minor Prophets. Especial reference to Hosea and Amos. Prof. B. I. Wheeler.

7. Introduction to a History of the Jews. A sketch of the political, literary, and religious development of the Jews from the times of the earliest records. Due regard will be paid to recent Old Testament criticism and an endeavor made to present its result impartially, but in no destructive spirit. Dr. W. F. Willcox will present this course.

8. Hebrew Poetry. In this course will be taken up the poetical books of the Bible, as the books of Job, the Psalms, and they will be treated from the standpoint of a sympathetic literary criticism. Dr. O. F. Emerson conducts this course.

No restrictions are made as to who shall attend these classes and any student in the University is always welcome whether he is a member of the Christian Association or not.

Cornell's new library, the pride of every Cornellian's heart, was dedicated Oct. 7, with interesting ceremonies. The building is located on the brow of the hill just South of Morrill Hall and commands a lovely view of the valley for a score of miles. It is built of white sandstone with red tiled roof and is surmounted by a massive campanile a hundred and eighty feet high in which have been placed the chimes and the clock. The vestibule is of white marble and the doors of heavy oak. The entrance hall extends to the roof and is lighted by stained glass windows. Convenient cloak rooms are provided for the men and women students. On the main floor are the general reading room, the librarian's room, the cataloguing room and the periodical room. The main room, which is the most important is rectangular in shape and will accommodate two hundred readers. Six or eight thousand books will be placed in alcoves opening directly from the room and free of access to all. The stack rooms are on the west side of the building and are seven stories in height. The south room is devoted to works on art and belles-lettres, the other to belles lettres and philosophy. The fourth floor of the stacks is on a level with the reading room and matters are so arranged that no book is over a hundred and twenty feet from the librarian's desk. The librarian's room and the cataloguing room are the centres of the building and are both finely arranged rooms. On the second floor is the room devoted to the President White Library and above that are seminary rooms, for the Sage School of Philosophy, European History, American History and Philosophical Research. On the floor below the main rooms are seminary rooms for Political Economy, French and German, Greek and Latin and English. The equipment of the building throughout is as fine as money and time can secure and the building is doubtless the finest in America devoted to the uses of a library. Over the main entrance is placed a bust of Jennie McGraw Fiske and in the vestibule is a tablet with the inscription:

"The good she tried to do shall stand as if 'twere done. God finishes the work by noble hands begun."

In loving memory of Jennie McGraw Fiske, whose purpose to found a great library for Cornell University has been defeated. This house has been built and endowed by her friend, Henry W. Sage, 1891." The exercises today took place in the lecture room of the building and a crowd more than filling the room was present. All University work was suspended. Ex-President White at the same time presented to the University his private historical library of 30,000 volumes. President D. H. Gilman was the orator of the day. He made an eloquent address on the great libraries of the world, their development and usefulness. In the course of his remarks, he referred in words of highest praise to the Worcester Public Library, and spoke of Mr. Green as the most devoted, judicious and painstaking librarian in charge of a public library in the country. The new building cost $500,000 and will accommodate 400,000 books. The endowment consists of $300,000, the income of which is to be devoted exclusively to the purchase of books.

The nineteenth annual convention of the Alpha Phi Fraternity held its sessions in Barnes Hall last week. About fifty-five delegates were present from all the chapters including the University of Minnesota, Boston University, Syracuse University, De Pauw, Cornell and North Western University. Last evening the convention held an open session at Barnes Hall which was attended by a large audience. The platform was tastefully decorated with the fraternity colors, Bordeaux and gray. A handsome floral design representing the fraternity pin occupied a prominent place on the platform while palms and other potted plants were used in the decoration of the platform. The presiding officer of the evening was Miss Lattimer of Ontario, Syracuse '87. Prayer was offered by Prof. C. M. Tyler. Following this was a song by the Alpha Phi quartet of Syracuse University. The poetess of the evening was Miss F. B. Dillingham of Boston University and her production was above the usual order of convention poems. Miss Hardee rendered a pleasing vocal solo. The principal address of the evening was by Mrs. M. F. Crowe, who spoke on the relation of Higher Education to the Home. Mrs. Crowe has been professor of history at Wellesley and was at one time the principal of the college at Grinnell, Iowa. She gave a very pleasing and instructive address and held her hearers till the end. In closing she paid a beautiful tribute to the woman of the future, portraying her in charming language. No formal reception was held at the close of the exercises but many of the guests had the pleasure of meeting some of the delegates from other colleges.

LOUIS ERVILLE WARE.

Oct. 7, 1891.

Wesleyan.

For several weeks past the daily papers have contained an account of a new rule which is supposed to have been made in regard to the calls of the students at the ladies' dormitory. This report is utterly void of any foundation and probably arose from the fact that a short time ago President Raymond said that the ladies should spend their evenings in study and not in receiving callers every evening in the week.

No rule has been passed, however, nor has anything been done which might even indicate that any measure would be taken to prevent the students doing as they have done in the past.

The students are highly indignant that any such nonsense should have found its way into the papers, for, though they know that no person of sound judgment and common sense would give it credit, yet it represents matters at Wesleyan as they are not.

As to the report that coeducation is not a success at Wesleyan, we would like to say that the strongest proof of the contrary is that each class, upon entering, contains more ladies than that of the year before and that their standard of scholarship is fully as high as that of the gentlemen students.

The students sincerely hope that whenever anything is published concerning the University, care will at least be taken to see that the facts of the case are known and not misrepresented.

The students were particularly fortunate on Sunday last, in being able to hear an address by Prof. W. T. Davison of Richmond College, England. Mr. Davison is professor of Hebrew and Biblical exegesis in the college and was a delegate to the Ecumenical Conference, where he read a paper upon the "Bible and its Relation to Modern Thought." His address in the chapel was upon this subject and was attentively listened to by a large audience. He was the guest, Sunday, of the Alpha Delta Phi Fraternity.

The first social event of the college year took place Thursday evening last, when the members of Alpha Delta Phi entertained their friends at the chapter house. Friends from New York and elsewhere were present and a very pleasant evening was enjoyed by all.

Social evenings are also being planned by Eclectic and Psi Upsilon.

Prof. John M. Van Vleck, vice-president of the college, has returned from Washington where he has been for some time past as a delegate to the Ecumenical Conference.

Boston University.

The Freshmen class have a class social Friday evening, Oct. 30th.

Lambda Charge, of the Theta Delta Chi Fraternity, initiated thirteen men Wednesday evening. Clay W. Holmes of Elmira, N. Y., the president of the Grand Lodge was present and conducted the initiation. The following are the initiates: Eugene M. Bosworth, Walter W. Breck, Geo. B. Dean, Altus D. Flower, Jewell Flower, Clifford F. Gregg, Heman A. Harding, Warren F. Low, Albert B. Meredith, Charles W. Pierce, Carl T. Taylor, Edward C. Wyman and Herbert H. Yeames. The banquet was held in the Copley Square Hotel.

The first number of the University Beacon was issued last Saturday. This year it is published semi-monthly and contains twelve pages instead of sixteen as formerly. There was considerable delay in getting out the first number but hereafter they expect to issue the paper on time.

The first meeting of the Epsilon Chapter of the Convocation of Boston University was held at 12 Somerset Street, Wednesday afternoon, at four o'clock. The subject of the meeting was "Informal Talks on European Experiences."

Amherst.

Last Wednesday saw the best game of the season thus far, on Pratt Field. Stagg's team from Springfield was beaten 24-0 only a week after Stagg had beaten Amherst at Springfield. The college is consequently encouraged, and is much more hopeful in regard to the issue with Williams.

The brick house, once occupied by President Stearns, and known as the "Presidents' house," is being remodelled quite extensively for the occupancy of President Gates. The interior is changed and a large brick addition made.

Dr. Meredith of Brooklyn, formerly of Boston, preached in the college church last Sunday.

Mt. Holyoke.

The chief event of the week was the celebration of Hallowe'en. If there is a maid left who does not know her future fate, it is not because of lack of opportunities for finding out. There were several private parties and secret expeditions down stairs with mirrors, but the largest and best time was in the gymnasium. The white sheeted figures in the fantastically decorated room presented a very weird effect to those onlookers who did not care to join the masqueraders. Jack o'lanterns, large and small, lighted the scene. Tableaux were introduced representing the witches of Endor around a smoking caldron, another from Virgil Eclouge's where the sorceress calls Daphne back by charms. Refreshments of roasted chestnuts, seed cakes, and other traditional dainties were served on waiters decorated (?) with tiny skeletons. After the unmasking, the ghostly creatures indulged in dancing and general sociableness.

The Seniors have chosen Mr. Waldron Smith of Boston as class photographer. He will take the pictures in South Hadley, much to the satisfaction of the class.

Sunday Schools.

The meeting of the M. E. Sunday School Union of Central Massachusetts in Grace Church, Wednesday, did not have the attendance that the character of the papers presented merited, for every part was clearly the result of much thought and study. Few business men will leave their regular routine duties to attend such a gathering as this, consequently those present were largely clergymen and ladies. Alfred S. Roe presided and the opening exercises were conducted by Dr. Nathaniel Fellows of Southbridge. The secretary, Rev. J. P. Kennedy of Shrewsbury, read the minutes of the meeting, in Gardner, and then followed an excellent paper by the Rev. W. T. Worth of Grace Church on "The Nature and Place of the Sunday School Concert." Though the paper called out many remarks from those listening, no exceptions could be taken to the reader's ideas which were to the effect that the concert should never drive out the regular religious meetings of the church, that they should be of a nature to inspire religious feelings in the hearts and minds of those listening.

The paper of A. W. Tirrell of Chicopee Falls on "The Work of the Teacher" provoked much discussion, led by the Rev. Mr. Best of Spencer as to the proper methods in the Sunday School, but as the reader had simply presented what he had himself seen and studied it was difficult to assail his positions, though it is safe to say that what is a success in one place may be a failure in another.

After the noon recess, Dr. J. O. Knowles of Coral Street, conducted the religious exercises, and then Mr. Frank J. Metcalf of this city, read a paper on "Bible History in the Sunday School." As this young gentleman is, already, conducting such a class in Grace Church he was well prepared to present the subject urging upon all to gain as much knowledge as possible of the land and the times wherein were done the deeds that Christianity commemorates.

The Rev. George S. Batters of Fitchburg presented in an admirable half hour talk, "God's Truth as its own Supplement to faithful instruction." The earnestness and soulfulness of the speaker aroused a responsive glow in the heart of every listener. After all our work and study there is nothing that can take the place of God's word in leading men to repentance. During a business period, the matter of the next meeting was left to the executive committee, the union committed itself to a request to have the Columbian Fair closed on Sunday and to any movement that will render safer the homes of our people.

The last paper was one by the Rev. J. D. Pickles of Trinity Church, setting forth the social element in Sunday School work. It is evident that where this gentleman is there will be no lack of active, vigorous work. Life will teem with motion. During the afternoon, Mrs. Dr. Fellows of Southbridge sang, to the delight of all hearers, "In the Secret of His Presence." Among those who contributed to the interest of the occasion by suggestion and debate, mention should be made of Dr. J. O. Knowles, Mr. Sargent of Shrewsbury and the Rev. Wm. Pentecost of this city who quite captivated all by reminiscent verses of his English boyhood days. The Rev. George Clark of Chicopee secretary of the Massachusetts Sunday School Union was introduced and spoke of the approaching meeting of the Union in Boston. At half past four the meeting was dismissed with the doxology and the benediction by Mr. Worth.

State Agent A. W. Edson of this city addressed the Middlesex County Teachers' Association in Tremont Temple, yesterday, on "Teaching Pupils to Think."

VOLAPÜK.

A large exhibit of volapük literature will be opened at the Natural History rooms, 12 State Street, Friday evening, Nov. 6, at which time a talk on the new international language will be given. All interested are invited.

Woman's Relief Corps Fair.

G. A. R. Hall, Thursday and Friday, day and evening, presented a beautiful appearance. Busy fingers had covered war emblems with indications of industry, and all that some poor soldier or his family may be made more comfortable in the downward course of life. The devotion of these women is beautiful to contemplate.

Last Tuesday evening the pupils of the School of English Speech gave a most delightful recital in their new rooms. All numbers were particularly well rendered, several of the pupils showing marked dramatic ability and all showing the result of careful training. "The Morning Mail" was a novelty in the way of entertainment, not a word being said, the emotions being expressed by facial expression and action. The final number was also a new feature and the "stage pictures" as arranged by the teachers of the school for the occasion, were very fine, being accompanied by the beautiful old song which made a most pleasing and fitting ending for the evening. Those taking part were Misses Mabelle Jenkins, Nellie York, Annie Smith, Mabelle King, Luu Isaacs, Nellie Delany, Ella Johnson, Alma Collins, Miss Buckman, Arline Hall, Harry Hosley. The hall, as well as the reception room at the end of the stage, was more than full and many friends were unable to obtain entrance.

David Manning.

In conformity with the plan, announced when LIGHT was started, viz., to present each week the picture of some noteworthy person or object, interesting to Worcester, this week is given an excellent likeness of David Manning, Esq., Republican candidate from the 1st Worcester District for the State Senate. One year since, LIGHT favored its readers with the faces and sketches of the then rival candidates, William A. Gile and John R. Thayer. The latter is again the Democratic contestant for the position.

Mr. Manning has long been a well known resident of Worcester and to many his picture will give nothing new. Its features need no pointing out here, for they speak for themselves. Though living in Worcester, since boyhood, he claims Paxton as his native town, where he was born August 29, 1846. Three of his first ten years were spent in Leicester. When ten years old his father, David Manning, Senior, removed permanently to Worcester and in the public schools of this city, David, Junior, received the ground work for a college training. He was graduated from the High School in Principal Green's day in 1865, going thence to Yale College. His college days were during the presidency of Theodore Dwight Woolsey, and among the 116 members making up the class of 1869 were his present rival, John R. Thayer, Prof. Perrin, of Yale, Prof. Richardson of Dartmouth and Prof. Scott of Johns Hopkins. Another class-mate and room-mate, as well, was Dr. Wm. H. Workman, formerly of this city. Mr. Manning was a member of the D. K. E. Fraternity. Returning to Worcester after a successful college career, standing twentieth man in his class, he began the study of law. A portion of his time was spent in the Harvard Law School and he was admitted to the Bar in 1872. For six years, he was with Rice and Blackmer and afterwards was, for two years, in partnership with Burton W. Potter.

If a man has a good birthright, it is his privilege to take pleasure in it, and surely in Mr. Manning's lineage, there is much to excite interest, if not pride. His father was descended from that William Manning who came from England in 1634 and settled in Cambridge, having his virtues recited by the prince of local historians, the Rev. Lucius R. Paige in his history of that town and city. This first Manning assisted in the building of Harvard Hall one of the very earliest of the college buildings. The Senior Manning died April 15, 1890, at the advanced age of seventy-eight years. He was born in Sutton, N. H., whence he came to Concord, Mass., and so to Worcester, having, nearly all his life, followed the business of a boot manufacturer. A communicant of Union Church, he held, in the highest degree, the confidence and respect of his fellows. The American Mannings are allied to the family of the English Cardinal. To show how facial characteristics may prevail over a long term of years, it is not a little interesting to note that the Cardinal's face in a group of distinguished Englishmen might be mistaken, readily, for that of our late Worcester manufacturer. The mother of our candidate was Lucy B. Grosvenor, a cousin of the late Judge Charles Allen and a grand-niece of that staunch Revolutionary hero, Samuel Adams. She is still living, having been the mother of six children, viz., Mrs. Joseph A. Titus, George G., Theodore, David, Jr., C. Walter and Joseph A. These sons, except David, are all in the jobbing business of boots and shoes, two in Boston, and two in Worcester. Mr. David Manning took for his wife Miss Elizabeth, daughter of the late Alexander Bigelow. She was also a class-mate in the High School, an instance of a youthful intimacy prolonged through life. They have one child, a son, Alexander B., eleven years old.

As a lawyer, Mr. Manning commands the respect of a wide circle of acquaintances and when the armless hero of Fredericksburg, Serg't Thomas Plunkett, died, it was found that he had named Mr. Manning his executor. Mr. Manning is a cousin of Worcester County's Judge of Probate, Wm. T. Forbes and he has had himself some judicial experience, having been appointed by Gov. Long in 1881 an associate justice of the Central District court, a place held till 1887, when he resigned to accept a representative nomination.

His entrance upon political life was in 1888, when he served as representative in the General Court for Ward 7. In this capacity, he discharged his duties faithfully and zealously. In the Legislature he was chairman of the committee on Liquor Laws and he would be a rash man who would say that he did not devote himself to his duties. The make up of committees that year was on the basis of only one important place for each man, so in this position his record was made. The hostility that his firm attitude engendered ought not to be very much to his discredit, especially among Republicans. The following year he was defeated for the renomination by William B. Spout, Esq., after a contest, yet memorable in the annals of the Ward. In 1888, he was a member of the State Central Committee, and was ever prominent in forwarding the interests of his party, and, thereby, as he intended, those of his Commonwealth.

Ainsworth Reed of Victor, Mich., left Worcester in 1835. Though a native of Royalston, he had lived in Worcester and sixty years ago knew the village well. During the early portion of this month, he paid his old home a visit. How changed! There was little left to remind him of earlier days, but so great was his vigor and activity, he actually tired out his nephew, Arba Pierce, pedestrian though he is. The latter says his uncle was insatiable in his search after reminders of long ago. He left for his western home, the 9th, inst.

Hallow'e'en.

Tonight is All Hallow's evening, but Americans are very likely to forget Saints' Days and festivals, so prevalent beyond the seas. Were it not for Burns' poems and our many Scotch residents, it is doubtful if any considerable number would remember that this day was introduced in behalf of all the saints since it was impossible to devote a whole day to every saint in the calendar. To our Scotch friends, however, the word calls up many delightful memories of home and youthful pranks in that land of cakes and heathery hillsides. May they get much pleasure from them.

About Folks.

Mr. Robert A. Scott, at one time a compositor on the Telegram and a shining light of the Telegram base ball team, has returned to his position in the composing room of the New York Times after a ten weeks' struggle with a bad case of blood-poisoning, the result of injuries received in a game of ball in the Newspaper League of New York city. Mr. Scott is well known in this city and the Eastern section of the state as an athlete of considerable ability, and his recovery will be hailed with pleasure by his old-time acquaintances.

The new Turkish bath house on Sudbury Street has been liberally patronized since its opening. Mr. Jensen, the manager, is to be congratulated on the assistance of an efficient corps of practical operators who are thoroughly acquainted with the details of their business.

The show windows of John A. Hartigan's excellent grocery store, on Pleasant Street, present a most inviting appearance to the passer-by.

W. S. Armstrong & Co., custom shoemakers, throw open the doors of their elegant and commodious new store in Rogers' Block, corner of Main and Pleasant Streets, this morning, for the inspection of the public. The firm intend to make a specialty of the Armstrong hygienic shoe, which has been received most favorably elsewhere, owing to the comfort and health which inevitably follows the wearing of it. Custom-made shoes, which are in great demand at the present time, will receive the careful attention of the management.

Mr. Fred W. Stiles and son, Rufus, of Westley, R. I., have been visiting his father, Major F. G. Stiles of Harrington Avenue. During his stay he made several photographs of the old Stiles lot in Rural Cemetery. He returned Monday last.

Very many friends who knew of the serious illness of Tyler Newton, late janitor at the High School, will rejoice to learn that he has so far recovered as to resume work at Darling Brothers. Jock is well too.

Master Thomas F. Kernan of Springfield, who for some months has been employed in LIGHT'S composing room, has returned to his home.

During the latter part of last week and the earlier days of this, the familiar face of George R. Kennedy was missed from our streets and his accustomed haunts. He has been having a slight attack of illness from which, however, he has rallied with his accustomed vigor and alacrity.

Books and Bookmen

The November Ballou's Monthly Magazine has an entertaining table of contents. In addition to the usual number of short stories, there are instructive articles on "Avalanches," "The Blizzards of the North-west" and "The Identification of Criminals by Measurements." The Young Folks' Story Teller is pleasing and the miscellaneous departments at the end of the magazine interest and amuse.

Ailes D'Alouette, by F. W. Bourdillon, Boston, Roberts Brothers, 1897. 75 cents.

If the title had been "Wings of a Lark," possibly it would mean more to the average reader. It is published in most beautiful form, with a lark on the wing as a frontispiece, and opposite, the words:

"When like a lark the soul springs,
Of verse she makes her airy wings.

"Oh may these verses, pair and pair,
Some heart in heavenward flight appear."

All the verses are arranged in pairs, many of them accompanied by suggestive bits of design in photogravure. There are lines for all moods and every one is beautiful. From one, learn all.

"The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one;
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the dying sun.

"The mind has a thousand eyes;
And the heart but one;
Yet the light of a whole life dies
When love is done."

Stillman; Two French Men of Letters; The Gods in Greece; Comment on New Books; The Contributors' Club.

The November Atlantic gives us a touch of Russian affairs by that devoted mistress of that subject, Isabel F. Haggood, a former Worcester lady. The subject is "Count Tolstoy at Home." "The Schools at Oxford" is a very fair setting forth of life in that great intellectual center. "A People without Law" is devoted to the condition of the nation's wards who inhabit the Indian Territory. "Journalism and Literature" is a judicious handling of the chief source of reading of the day. The Contributors' Club has "Bucolic Reading" and a very entertaining sketch on "Playing Second Fiddle." The writer objects to being recognized only as the owner of a beautiful dog.

Lowell and a Philosopher of the Backwoods.

As a young man Lowell visited the White Mountains, and he used to relate this anecdote as one of his experiences there:

"I was walking through the Franconia Notch and stopped to chat with a hermit, who fed with gradual logs the unwearied teeth of a sawmill. I asked him the best point of view for the Old Man of the Mountain. 'Dun no, —never see it! Too young and too happy either to feel or affect the Juvénalian indifference I was sincerely astonished, and I expressed it. The log-compelling man attempted no justification, but after a while asked, 'Come from Bawsn?' 'Yes' (with peculiar pride). 'Goodle to see in the zycinity o' Bawsn.' 'O yes!' I said. 'I should like, 'awl, I should like to stan' on Bunker Hill. You've been there often, likely?' 'No-o,' unwillingly, seeing 'the little end of the horn' in clear vision at the terminus of this Socratic perspective. 'Aw, my young fren', you've larned ood that wut a man kin see any day for nothin', children half price, he never does see. Nawthin' pay, nawthin' vally.'"—From The Home and Haunts of Lowell, by Frank B. Sanborn in New England Magazine for November.

St. Nicholas, The Century Co., Union Square, New York.

This number begins the new volume and it starts in with a deal of promise for the year. The first is a poem by Mildred Howells, which the frontispiece illustrates. An Arctic story of dogs is full of excitement. "The sea fight off the Azores" is a bit of history written in a fine way by C. H. Palmer. Then comes a continued story for the boys, by name "Tom Paulding" and, though the first chapter is descriptive, the second and third are full enough of life to make up. A chapter on Indian folklore tells more of that peculiar people. The Dickey Boy is a sad story, ending well but bringing tears to sympathetic hearts. There is a graphic description of a trip to Pike's Peak, an article on Russian children, a short story for the girls on Lancelot's tower, another in dialect and the racy poems imaginable, entitled "The barber of Sari-Ann." Everything in the magazine is so fully illustrated that the pleasure is doubled in reading it. The letters and puzzles together with Jack in the Pulpit's pages, and some short bits of verse make up a delightful number that we think cannot be improved upon.

Our Little Men and Women, from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

As usual this little book comes with the prettiest of pictures and stories to match. The print is so good, and the pictures so true, and the articles all so daintily written that we wonder there is a family which has ever seen the magazine that does not at once subscribe. The price per year is $1.

Babyland, from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

The first story tells how the baby only six months old named herself. There is a chapter from the toy closet and a bit more of Dot's house. This number like all before it is fully illustrated.

Scientific American.

We have become so accustomed to the rapid progress of science that new announcements do not surprise us so much as perhaps their importance would warrant. We expect something new in every number of the Scientific American. The subject of artificial rain has two articles this month. The transmission of electrical power is announced from France where it is said three hundred horse power was transmitted one hundred miles with little loss. If such is the case, much power of our rivers may be changed to electricity and carried to places where it can be advantageously used. Ninety miles an hour is fast running for a railway train but such a rate has been lately made, and a new train on the New York Central runs four hundred and forty miles in as many minutes. The latter is the more remarkable, as this high speed, sixty miles an hour, is kept up for nearly nine hours. Some of the longer articles are: "Memory as a Test of Age," "The Iguanadons at Brussels," "Thought," "Cable Road in New York," "Grain Elevators," "Toilet Soaps," "New Chemical Laboratory of Cornell University." The latter article is fully illustrated with plans and views of the new building. Munn & Co. $3 a year.

How California Would Have Treated the New Orleans Prisoners.

William T. Coleman, the chairman of the famous San Francisco Vigilance Committees of 1851, 1856, and 1857, in an account of their work which he has written for the November Century, refers to the recent lynching at New Orleans, and tells what he thinks the people of California would have done under the same circumstances. They would have organized in full force, he says, formed a court, appointed a judge and selected a jury; called for evidence, analyzed it carefully, put on the trial the people who had been discharged by the perjured jury, given the accused good counsel and the benefit of every doubt, and finally would have executed with due deliberation those whom they found guilty.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, will issue in November, Herbart's Allgemeines Pädagogik, translated by Henry M. Felkin of London, and edited, with an introduction, by Oscar Browning, author of Educational Theories. This book is not a mere text-book of pedagogy, but shows the intimate connection between Ethics, Psychology and Education. The translation will prove a great boon to those teachers who study the philosophy of teaching, but have not mastered German. Herbart is difficult to translate, but the translation merits very high praise for having so successfully reproduced the thought of the author.

Lippincott's Magazine. Contents: The Duke and the Commoner, Mrs. Poultney Bigelow; On the State of the Tide, F. Arnold; The Tetix, Clinton Scollard; Some Colonial Love-Letters, Anne H. Warton; Two Songs, Harrison S. Morris; The Return of the Rejected, Octave Thanet; Association Football, Frederick Wier; "Shadow and Substance," Barton Hill; Sorrow, Henry Peterson; The Evolution of Money and Finance, J. Howard Cowperthwait; The Restoration of Silver, John A. Grier; An Interviewer Interviewed—A Talk with George Alfred Townsend; Modern American Humor, William S. Walsh; With the Wits, (Illustrated by leading artists).

The scene of the story is laid in New York, where a society woman is sought by two lovers, one an English duke, the other a clever Dutchman. She hears of the latter's marriage, and becomes engaged to the duke. But before the day set for the marriage, the Dutchman returns and tells her that it was his cousin of the same name that was married. The woman loves the Dutchman, so gives up the duke for him. The two articles on money give opposite sides of the "Silver question," one claiming that gold only should be used as a standard of value, the other is a plea for bimetallism. Olive Thanet writes interestingly on the journeys of a manuscript and its many rejections. Fac-simile copies of editors' letters, declining the manuscript with thanks, are given. The result is that the writer turns to jam-making as more profitable than literature. "Gath" gives his newspaper experiences through an interviewer; and "Love Letters" from Wm. Penn, John Logan and others are reproduced.

His Marriage Vow by Mrs. Caroline Fairchild Corbin, from Lee & Shepard, Publishers, Boston, Mass. 50 cents.

This book is number fourteen in the Good Company series and is rather an unusual novel in that it portrays a struggle where right wins the day. Chester Elms marries an invalid because, having become engaged to her while she was well and strong, he thought it honorable to keep his word. From a sick bed she wields a powerful influence over him, but in spite of this, when his friend's widow comes to live near, and he finds her boy is named for himself, and that she has come to the place that she may look to him for advice and help, he falls in with the new comer. When she learns of his passion for her she goes away and Mr. Elms tries to give himself back to his wife. The book ends with her death and his marriage with Lucia. A well written book but rather improbable.

"In the High Valley," by Susan Coolidge. Roberts Brothers, Boston, Mass.

This is the fifth and last volume of the Katy Did Series. Those who have read the foregoing ones will surely want to read this. The style is similar to the others, always in that bright racy way, peculiar to Miss Coolidge. The opening chapter is an English scene and shows off to good advantage an English girl, though when brought in contact with an American the advantage is all on the American's side. Isabel's remarks and questions concerning the great country to which her brother is to take her to live are very funny. While crossing the water she makes ludicrous mistakes but is so good natured about it and so ready to learn that she wins her way. When they reach New York, she is overwhelmed by the attention shown her by her brother's friends and cannot understand the comradeship that he enjoys so much. She thinks Clover too officious, but at the last she marries the latter's brother and though she begins by thoroughly disliking all the family she ends by heartily loving them. There are several weddings and one ludicrous love scene with echoes thrown in. Though it is one of a series still it is so written that one may enjoy it if he has not the others of the set. It is a book to please all the young people and our parents may feel safe in having it in the house. In fact Miss Coolidge ranks with Miss Alcott as a writer for the young. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co. Price, $1.25.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Mr. G. H. Wilson an editorial writer for the Boston Musical Herald, devotes considerable space in the October number, published this week, to a criticism of the Worcester Festival. He begins by stating that there have been many improvements this year and that on the whole he looks back upon this festival with thanksgiving. Then follow detailed criticisms of the various new works presented and he closes with the following remarks: "It is only when its work is compared with that of one or two permanent orchestras in the country, that the playing of the Worcester Festival band suffers at all. Nowadays Mr. Zerrahn has few opportunities to conduct an orchestra worthy the name, and it is an incentive to him to stand before the musicians loaned by Mr. Nikisch. To his credit, he it is said, that in the performance of the trying Wagner selection and the MacDowell suite there was apparent a good degree of expression; towards the Suite in particular, Mr. Zerrahn seemed to have exerted his utmost.

"We have positive convictions about the future of the Worcester Chorus and two minds also expressing them. The atmosphere of Mechanics Hall (where the festivals are held) is so complacent during festival week, Mr. Zerrahn is so desperately worshipped by the chorus, and the majority of the public too, that it seems unnecessary and unkind to turn the hose of contrary opinion upon so harmonious a family; yet on the other hand, is it the duty of a critic who respects his calling to sit in silence under the lifeless, inexpressive singing at Worcester Festivals? The possibilities of the Worcester Chorus are large. There is a well-balanced choir of intelligent people, with good voices, the sopranos in particular, have admirable voices; and the tenors too, so often railed at and maligned, sometimes sing out with ringing and pleasant tone; the basses and altos are serviceable. Now this choir of good, natural gifts has no technique; its drill has been so superficial that only in music which it has sung for years, does one feel sure it will not break down. When attempting any new work, the hard parts are not mastered, they are usually cut entire—witness the slashing of 'Nineveh,' and the inartistic treatment of the most dramatic portion of Mr. Herbert's cantata (the chorus parts were omitted in a long ensemble for voices, orchestra and soprano solo); what is the reason of it all? It is either insufficient rehearsals or rehearsing of an insufficient kind, and we firmly believe the latter reason to be the true one, and further, the longer the directors put off considering this, the only defect in their undertaking, which means so much to Worcester County, just so long will they neglect a duty. Mr. Zerrahn does his best, but this is not sufficient to bring the Worcester Chorus to a proper or even interesting development; it will remain sluggish and untrained until removed from the Zerrahn methods and influence. It is not pleasant to feel obliged to say this; it is never pleasant to take the chance of grieving any human being."

Friday Populars.

The Preliminary concert of the Friday Pops last Friday evening was received by a large and enthusiastic audience. The talent was of the best and the program excellently rendered. The first concert of the course proper comes next Friday, when the Walter Emerson Concert Company is the attraction. Walter Emerson, the famous cornet virtuoso, needs no introduction to a Worcester audience. Miss Bertha Webb is noted as a violinist of great skill and Miss Minnie Babcock is one of the most famous of Chicago's contraltos. Miss Mae Fowler varies the program by reading. Edwin N. Shonert, pianist, was so well received last Friday there is no doubt of his popularity. Some good course seats are still left and can be purchased at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s.

Mrs. Mabel S. Hale.

The death of this lady on the 23d inst is a particularly sad event. The daughter of the late James B. Blakely, for four years Worcester's mayor, and herself the young wife of Mr. Charles S. Hale, her departure carries sorrow into a wide circle of friends. Long devoted to art, she and her husband were prominent in advancing the interests of artistic matters in Worcester. What she has done we can only surmise and regret that life was not granted her for accomplishment. Only thirty-two years of being, here, were granted her but there is a life beyond.

"Unnumbered by the flight of years
And all that life is love."

It was a sorrowing group that assembled at her childhood home, 50 West Street, Monday last to listen to the kind words of the Rev. Austin S. Garver, pastor of the 1st Unitarian Church and the Rev. E. H. Hall of Cambridge, her former pastor. All that loving, sympathizing friends could say or do has been said and done, yet many fond hopes lie buried in the grave by her father's side in Rural Cemetery. Surrounded by flowers, the last moments on earth were fragrant with the beautiful which she had so long studied and admired.

Without Capital.

How the Refusal of a Loan Led to Success.

"In spite of everything I can do, I am still penniless," and Ralph Gorden buried his face in his hands.

Ralph had sense, but he lacked capital. Capital and he would have been an assured success. For this purpose he would consult Mr. Horton, the banker.

"Good evening, Ralph," said the elderly gentleman, looking over his gold bowed glasses and exhibiting a very cordial and patronizing manner.

Ralph was always respectful, and if you will study his career you will readily perceive how important a part politeness played in his social and business relations.

"I wish to engage in business."

"Have you capital?"

"No, sir; but—"

"Ah!"

"If I could secure a loan from you I would amass a fortune—"

"I beg your pardon. I never lend money without real estate security."

The answer was decisive.

"First failures have been the successes of many, Ralph. Go try."

Ralph was not discouraged. But on the following morning, when the sun rose in his old time glory, the birds sang their wild familiar songs and business resumed its wonted clamor, he took little note as he hurried along the leading thoroughfare of the city.

"Will you lend me one thousand dollars to set myself up in business?" he inquired of Mr. Sampson, one of the prominent men of the place.

"What security?"

"None. I want it as a favor."

"Would be glad to accommodate you, Mr. Gorden, but business men don't do business in that way."

Receiving this all kindly, he sallied out and entered the private family of an esteemed friend.

"Mr. Garten, can I negotiate a loan of one thousand dollars?"

"For your sake I must refuse."

Ralph was turning; yet, notice that the placid equanimity of his temper remained inviolate. If he possessed no capital, he had suavity and forbearance in happy abundance.

"He seated, Ralph," continued this practical man, "and I will endeavor to show you how I am your friend in not being your friend. That sounds a trifle paradoxical. But, listen, for you are in no hurry. If you are in a hurry you will not succeed anyway. From what I have heard and seen myself you appear to have an abnormal feeling that you cannot succeed unless you have capital. Now, if you will investigate the matter statistically you will find that nine hundred and ninety men out of every thousand who have made a success of business had absolutely nothing to start with."

"Yes, sir."

"And if you will take the trouble to pursue your investigation you will find that a large percentage of business failures are directly traceable to too much assistance at the start."

Ralph Gorden was meeting new surprises.

"Now for your own benefit, I will not lend you a red cent."

Ralph's countenance fell. And yet he had sufficient sense to understand that all the advice received emanated from the kindest business motives.

"But, Ralph, I'll tell you what I will do. You strike right out in some direction, and if you fail, after an honest trial, you will not be compelled to repay an old debt."

"By George, that's so!"

"And, furthermore, I will make this proposition. If you will succeed without capital, I will give you one thousand dollars!"

Ralph was dumbfounded.

"I believe you are right," and Ralph returned to the street.

On his way through the chief places of business, he said to himself:—

"Wonder how all these men became so rich!" He hesitated. "I will ask them."

He knew Bangs, Barton & Co.

"I beg your pardon, gentlemen; may I ask you how you became so rich?"

"By being penniless at the start!"

He also knew the firm of Aldrich, Page & Co., by reputation.

"What made you so rich, gentlemen?"

"By being poor at the start, and not a cent's worth of credit."

Walker & Co., had just failed; and for the matter of that they had been partial failures all along. They had plenty of money to start with.

"So, so," and Ralph walked thoughtfully along. "Then I am the capital! I!" and returning home, he rolled up his sleeves, so to speak, and returned to work.

People always said that Ralph was a worker and industrious. "But, ah!" exclaimed the old heads, "he can earn money, but he cannot keep it!"

These same people were soon surprised, however, to see a little, unpretentious corner grocery started, with Ralph as sole proprietor.

"It wasn't much," some said, "but it was a beginning, a beginning!"

Curious people came in. Men with "inquiring eyes." Men with their arms thrust in cadaverous pockets. Some sat on the cracker barrels and looked on. They hadn't ever tried to succeed, and dropped in to see how such an attempt was supposed to work. A lad came in.

"A penny's worth o' figs."

The article was handled as if it had been twenty pounds of sugar for one dollar.

"Five cents worth of peanuts."

These were neatly done up in a little saw-edged paper bag. Ralph was a model of neatness and politeness, and his white apron and square paper hat gave him a sort of dashing appearance.

"A half dozen eggs."

The orders were slight.

"Two pounds of butter."

Ralph was encouraged.

One barrel of Haxall flour!"

This was quite a leap.

"Will deliver it after dinner."

Yet his visitors were still far in excess of his sales. But one thing had been demonstrated. He had got the people to coming that way! Could he hold them.

"A new broom sweeps clean," he reflected. "But time will tell."

"Well, Ralph hasn't much in his store, to be sure," said the skeptical, "yit he's er risin', er risin', an' that's somethin'!"

Ralph's horse and wagon consisted of himself and wheelbarrow! He delivered his few goods in this unpretentious manner. The boys called it Ralph's "one horse express."

The "new grocer" said little, thereby showing tact, but kept his sleeves rolled up and attended strictly to business. He had no capital, but earning a few dollars, he secured a little merchandise on thirty days' credit. He had one thing, he had manners, he had social ability, he had accommodation. He was just as sociable with the man who bought a jackknife as the one who bought a shovel. With these as leading elements of success, he met his first bills, paid cash for his second order of goods.

Two months had gone. Six. Now he had a clerk. But no horse. Six months more. He had a second clerk.

Ralph began to receive congratulations on all sides. The friend who would not lend him a red cent, and who was to give him one thousand dollars, came sauntering in.

"You don't seem to need borrowed money now, Ralph."

"No, thank you. I have a thousand to lend" he laughed.

"Ralph, you have won the first thousand dollars. The rest will come easy enough. It is the first thousand that decides the fate of millions."

Ralph was very happy. His business increased. His friends multiplied and young men came to him to borrow their first thousand dollars. Time wore on. The little corner grocery became too small. In more commodious quarters they were soon established. For it was "R. Gorden & Co., Grocers" now. And the young man who had no capital was the leading grocer firm of the city.

"So you could succeed without capital, Ralph," said his practical friend.

"Yes; and it has been a good lesson to me." "Which you couldn't have learned if I had loaned you a thousand dollars," interrupted the other.

"No, sir. And to-day I am saying to the young men of my community: "You can succeed without capital. Try."

And Ralph's face glowed. He had been an assured success. And he still superintended his own business.—Horace Walker, in Yankee Blade.

The New City Hall.

BY H. K. M.

Why is Lincoln Square a suitable location?
1st. Because it is the territorial centre of the city.

2nd. Because it is contiguous to the location of public buildings of like character which are essentially identical in their purposes and uses.

For more than 150 years Lincoln Square has been the geographical and court centre of Worcester, and it will undoubtedly continue so to be, during the existence of a city hall built by the present generation. It is clearly self evident that it would be unwise for the city to erect a public building that did not anticipate the city's needs for at least fifty years. Should this anticipation of the city's needs be limited to simply square feet of floor space?

Is it only a mathematical question of board measure? If so, then the building would be a suitable monument to the city's superficial thinking, an ornate memorial to her colossal confusion of municipal incapacity.

As stated, the territorial and court centre has stood immovable for over a century and a half, if has not swayed from its anchorage by the tide of real estate values, it is not an itinerant centre, casting away today the whims of yesterday; it is not a U. S. tramp which has created three post office centres in the past few years. But it stands a fixture of the last and the present century. Transitory centres are but the playthings of today. That shifting centre on the municipal checker board prolongs its existence by artful dodging, but does not cluster about it the delightful associations of a dignified and practical permanence. Would it not be wise for the city to link its municipal centre with its enduring and unchangeable court centre?

Treat it as you may this is one of the most important questions ever submitted to the city for intelligent action. Shall the municipal centre be linked with the court centre? The importance of the city's decision demands that it should rest on the strongest evidence of wisdom based on practical experience. Personal opinion, likes and dislikes, locality whims and the real estate boomer have nothing to do with this issue, it towers above them all, like a mountain peak and pierces the pure atmosphere of the highest type of statesmanship in moulding the material interests of a progressive community. In times past when the city has met important questions of public policy she has shown herself to be an apt scholar in the school of controlling foreign and American precedents. When her sewage conundrum puzzled her, she sent her engineer to Europe to study the leading precedents of the old world. That course was an eminently wise one. When the city first met the demands of electricity for street traffic, its action was controlled by leading American precedents. These precedents have moulded a public policy and the city has justified its course, because the precedents adopted had the inherent value of the supreme authority of acknowledged supremacy. We thus find the door of precedents constantly swinging on its hinges at the repeated knocks of the city. Why should the municipal centre of the city be linked with its court centre? Because centuries of experience have proved the public utility and convenience of linking, in locality, the City Hall and the Court House; the municipal centre with the court centre. Regarding this universal precedent of the methodical grouping and classification of identical centres, London in 1411-31 built Guild Hall for the sittings of the magistrates and municipal corporation. The New Law Courts near Lincoln's Inn between Temple Bar and St. Clement Dances, at the east end of the Strand, was the centralization of London's various courts. Neither Paris nor any other city in the world has ever witnessed such magnificent improvement as under her late empire massed her like and identical interests in the Palais de Justice where her elaborate system of jurisprudence known as the "Code Napoleon" is so wisely administered. Switzerland, at Geneva, has the Hotel de Ville, containing the cantonal and municipal offices. We find the wisdom of this indisputable fact fully recognized in our own country. Boston builds her City Hall within a few feet of her court house; Springfield has recently placed her beautiful court house just across the street from her City Hall; New York's City Hall stands at the side of her court house; Brooklyn's white marble City Hall is close by the county court houses, and at its side stands the municipal building; Baltimore's City Hall, one of the finest municipal buildings in America, costing $2,271,135, is at the side of her massive granite court houses; Washington's municipal buildings are grouped.

On Penn Square, in Philadelphia, at the intersection of Broad and Market streets, stand the vast public buildings for law courts and public offices, covering an area of four and one half acres, with a total cost of buildings of over $10,000,000; at Chicago, the new City Hall and county court house building, occupying an entire block and costing $5,000,000, are one and the same building; St. Louis' City Hall is near by her court house, one of the finest public buildings in the country, built of Genesee limestone at a cost of $1,200,000; Charleston's (S. C.) City Hall stands opposite her substantial brick court house and by its side is the Guard House or Police Headquarters; at Columbus, O., the county court houses fronting Monumental Park stand just east of the magnificent City Hall; Rochester's imposing gray limestone City Hall building is just back of the county court house; at Buffalo the court house and City Hall fronting on Franklin Street constitutes a magnificent granite edifice, which was completed in 1880 at a cost of $1,500,000.

Can it be seriously argued that this notable line of precedents in the uniformly methodical grouping of identical centres is not the result of design? Does it prove the existence of a methodless and hap-hazard purpose, or a wise and beneficent orderly design?

In harmony with this great principle of municipal order, where should our new City Hall be most wisely placed? Clearly, contiguous to the county court houses at Lincoln Square. One of the leading municipal uses of a City Hall building is the City Registry and on every principal of grouping identical centres, this should be contiguous to the Registry of Deeds, as well as to the courts. The records of the City Government and the Assessors are of frequent use in the courts. The valuable County Law Library of several thousand volumes is an important auxiliary in the intelligent discharge of official municipal duties, and for ready reference should be near at hand. The City Treasury and the County Treasury have a mutuality of interest and should be side by side.

Our system of public records is substantially one of entirety and requires for public convenience, a common centre.

The Salisbury Mansion site is one of local distinction. Could Worcester do a more graceful act in just recognition of the two distinguished lines of ancestry so clearly identified with the early struggles and present importance of the city, than to locate her new City Hall upon the Salisbury site in Lincoln Square—a square also suggestive of that great name which will indissolubly link the past and the future of the American people?

To the Spartan prayer, "Give us something good and beautiful," we would add, and give it to us in Lincoln Square.

Valley Forge

The recent sale of fifty acres of the famous territory identified with the experiences of the Continental Army during the winter of 1777-8, is of peculiar interest to antiquarians. The order of American Patriots owns the stone house which constituted Washington's headquarters, but the whole surface over which the army camped is many thousands of acres in extent. This part, sold at $10 per acre, is said to include the valley through which runs a stream on whose dam was located the Forge which gave to the section its name. That portion of the vicinity over which half naked and starving Continentals wandered is a mile and a half from this particular section. During Centennial year, a large portion of the land was covered with heavy timber. Some of this has been cleared away since; but today a maple tree more than a foot through stands in the troat of what was an earthwork in 1777. Should America really wish to preserve a memorial of the Revolution, a real object lesson, no better opportunity could be found than that afforded by this Pennsylvanian acreage. Huts might be constructed and earthworks constructed which would graphically show how the fathers lived and suffered.

Hoppin—Bowen.

At the Thorndike in Boston, Monday last, Mr. Charles A. Hoppin, Jr., of this city was married to Miss Maie F. Bowen of Acton, the Rev. Dr. Mears of this city performing the ceremony. Mr. Hoppin has had charge of the Denholm McKay Company's advertising for some time, a young man reared and educated in Worcester. His wife is the daughter of Mr. Augustus V. Bowen of Acton. Only immediate friends were present, F. N. Hoppin, the groom's brother acting as best man. A brief wedding trip will be followed by permanent residence on Jacques Avenue. A host of friends extend congratulations and best wishes.

The Friesland, Red Star Line, has reached Antwerp, landing her passengers Monday, last. Among her passengers was Miss Margaret Harlow of this city.

Passion often makes a fool of a man of sense; and it sometimes makes a man of sense of a fool.

In a recent interview, in the Chicago Tribune, United States Senator Washburn said: "The Americans, as a rule, who go aboard are a lot of idiots. Europe is filled with American travelers, and but few of them know anything about their own country. Many of the idiots go aboard to study the French and German languages, when they don't know anything about their own; neither do they know anything about the history of their own country, and their ignorance is displayed when any questions are addressed to them on the subject."

"My Mountain Brook."

You were born in the wilderness ages ago,
'Neath forest, and fernland, sweetheart mine,
And your bright lights and shadows swelling along,
Wove a spell round my lone heart sweeter than wine.
You're a wild, weird enchantress through meadow and mead
My jewel, my dancing girl, rippling along.
Sound, sound your wild music brought here from the clouds,
And let hearts be brightened, love, by your sweet song.
There are daisies and violets on your green banks,
There are gold-hearted lilies nestled up in your nooks,
There are sweet drooping willows bending down their fair heads,
Craving kisses far sweeter than aught found in books.
You were part of my soul-life in æons ago,
When our world was a foundling, whirling through space,
And the morning stars sang at its birth a new song,
While the sun's golden radiance bathed anew your bright face.
You wind round the hill-side and gentle-eyed king
Quench their thirst from the blood that flows clear through their veins.
And plunging and laughing o'er moss-covered rocks,
You sweep deep and silent through hot arid plains.
Who can tell of your parentage? Oh soul-mate so fair,
Who cherished your infant life? Treasure of mine.
Were the white snow-capped mountains your first cradle bed,
Far up 'neath the blue where the twinkling stars shine?
There are strange waves of past life rippling through space,
There are wonderful chords that go sweeping along,
And the souls whose bright strings are attuned fine and clear,
Catch the weird notes of melody from Nature's "dawn" song,
Who knows but the rain-drop, with its many bright
STRANGE WINTER) Good-bye
Clasped a glowing rayed stargleam in the stillness of night?
Who knows but the twin "wedded" first gave thee birth,
Far back in the twilight ere earth's children had light?
You are mine, and I claim you, let them murmur who may,
You were part of my life in the far distant past,
And the soul that "speaks out" from your bright laughing face,
Claims a kinship with mine in the centuries vast,
It has slumbered but ne'er broken, mate of ages ago—
Though to me this long slumber seems one fair sunny day.
Come back to my arms, long lost seraph so fair,
And weave in my earth life, love's sweet flowers for aye.
—Fred L. Hildreth.

An amusing encounter between the Prince of Wales and a miner took place while the prince was recently staying in Yorkshire (says the Recorder). The prince and a friend, going for a stroll one morning, at the turning of a lane came across a miner who had with him a brace of bull-terrier pups. The prince's companion asked how much he had paid for the pups. "Two quid," replied the miner, with true Yorkshire brevity. The Prince of Wales examined the dogs critically for a few moments, and then remarked: "Don't you think two pigs would have been a better investment for you, my friend?" "Maybe," replied the collier; "but, mister, what a blooming fool a chap would look a-going ar-rating with two pigs." The argument was irresistible, and the prince, with his friend, retired.

The reason that many men want their desire, is, because their desires want reason. He may do what he will, that will do but what he may.

Curious Corner.

The Colossus of Rhodes.

This was a gigantic statue of Apollo, of the sun god. It rested on moles on each side of the beautiful harbor of Rhodes, and vessels passed between its brazen legs. It was over 100 feet in height, and there were winding stairs by which it was ascended. The statue held in one hand a light for the direction of mariners. It was thrown down presumably by an earthquake, and never rebuilt, but fragments of the statue remained for 900 years. At length a Jewish merchant bought the brass and loaded 900 camels with it. The value of the brass was estimated at $150,000. At the present time the harbor of Rhodes is nearly useless, and the island has many times suffered from earthquakes.—Detroit Free Press.

Aluminum has been suggested as a material for coins, but there are objections to it. It has always a greasy feeling, due to the presence of a slight but unavoidable film of oxide of aluminum over its surface.

A Lincoln Story.

In the course of the conversation Mr. Cotton told the following story: "Judge Pettis of Pennsylvania, who was an active contemporary of the Lincoln administration, told me recently that as he was going into the White House one day, he met Ben Wade coming out. When he was admitted into the President's presence, Lincoln said: 'Pettis, did you see Wade going out, just now?'" Pettis responded that he did.

"Well, he just said to me, Mr. Lincoln, before you were inaugurated I prayed and prayed that Chief Justice Taney might live to swear you in, but now that you are inaugurated, he hangs on so long that I am fearfully afraid I overdid it."

In a certain Worcester family are four children. Naturally, the number of stockings is numerous. The Swedish servant, looking out of the window and seeing the array upon the clothes' line, exclaimed, "I do think this family has too many legs."

Do you want the best of foot wear, just call in at J. K. Brown's, No. 15 Front Street. You will have to ask strange questions, not to have them satisfactorily answered by Mr. Brown or his assistants.

Clara Barton.

On the 2d of October, this distinguished native of Worcester County was invested with the badge of Chaplain-in-Chief of the Woman's Relief Corps. The act was performed by Lincoln Corps of San Francisco, by permission of the National President. The ceremony was witnessed by fully five hundred people. Miss Barton seems to have quite recovered her health and is still going about doing good.

Lemon Pie.

One smooth, juicy lemon; grate the rind and squeeze out the juice straining it on the rind; one cupful of sugar, a piece of butter the size of an egg, in a bowl use one good-sized cupful of boiling water in a pan on the stove. Moisten a tablespoonful of cornstarch, and stir it into water; when it boils, pour it over the sugar and butter and stir in the rind and juice. When a little cool, add the beaten yolks of two eggs. Butter a deep plate, and cover all over with cracker dust (very fine crumbs). This is the crust; pour in the mixture, and bake. Then frost with the two whites, and brown.

Make two cakes, one with Cleveland's baking powder; the second with any other. Note the difference.

The Cleveland cake is fine grained, keeps its natural flavor and moisture; "the other" is coarse grained, as if the sugar was too coarse, soon dries out and becomes husky.

Cleveland's leavens best because its strength is produced by cream of tartar and soda only, not by ammonia or alum.

Good to Eat.

Puff Omelette.

Stir into the yolks of six eggs and the whites of three, one tablespoonful of corn starch in a teacupful of cream, with salt and pepper. Melt some butter in a pan, pour in the eggs and set in the oven. When thick, beat the whites of the other three eggs and pour over. Set to brown. Serve immediately.

Browned Rice.

Cook one cupful of rice with three cupfuls of milk in a double boiler until very soft. Season it with one tablespoonful of butter. Pack it closely in a small bread-pan. When cold, cut it in half-inch slices and brown them delicately in butter. Or spread the slices slightly with butter, put them in a fine, well buttered grid-iron, and color a light brown over a clear fire.

A Choice Dish.

Unseal a can of salmon, set in a kettle of hot water, and cook for half an hour. For a one-pound can of salmon, boil hard one dozen eggs. Cut each in three slices, and place on a platter. While the eggs are boiling, prepare a pint of drawn butter sauce. Drain the fish and pour over the sliced eggs, and over both pour the drawn butter. This is a delicious dish, hot for breakfast, or cold for luncheon.

Mashed Potatoes.

Pare your potatoes very thin, and let them lie in cold water one hour. Put them into boiling water slightly salted and boil steadily until you can pierce them with a fork; then pour off the water, sprinkle them lightly with salt, and add, to one dozen of medium-sized potatoes, a piece of butter the size of a hen's egg; mash them with a wire masher, and add a half cupful of hot cream, and beat them until very light and white.

Steamed Corn Bread.

Put two cups of cornmeal into a bowl, add a teaspoonful of salt. Dissolve half-teaspoonful soda in a tablespoonful of warm water, and add to it half-cup of molasses. Add to this the corn meal, and then add sufficient sour milk, not quite a pint, to make the batter so that it will drop from the spoon. Put this into a well-greased mold. Put on the lid and steam it for four hours; then remove the lid and bake it for thirty minutes.

Almond Macaroons.

Blanch and pound fine a pound of sweet almonds. Whip the whites of seven eggs, add one pound of sugar, mix well; drop on buttered paper, sift sugar over and bake quickly.

Mrs. Parker.

Chicken Caked in Cream.

The chicken may be delightfully prepared as follows: Cut up nicely, and lay in a baking dish. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Cut into bits over it a quarter of a pound of butter, dredge with a tablespoonful of flour from a sifter, pour into the dish one teacupful of rich sweet cream, and set in a very hot stove to brown quickly.

"Not all is gold that glitters" is a true saying; it is equally true that not all is sarsaparilla that is so labelled. If you would be sure of the genuine article, ask for Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and take no other. Health is too precious to be trifled with.

HOUSEWIVES.

Our Schools.

CHAPTER VII.

Kindergartens.

In contemplating the great changes in our schools, in the near future, which are seen to be inevitable, the Kindergarten is the first and most important object to which attention should be directed, as the starting point and foundations of the "new education"; and to any one unacquainted with the system, or rather want of system, which has long obtained in the management of our schools, it must seem surprising that the kindergarten has not long ago become part of the school system, and that its methods have not found their way into all the elementary schools. It is hardly necessary to insist upon the importance of these kindergartens as a vital element in our school system.

In introducing this subject I cannot do better than to quote the following from a late address, before a convention of teachers by President Gates of Amherst College who is reported to have spoken as follows: "When a man dies" says Schopenhauer 'a world perishes—the world which he bore in his head.' If the ceasing of each individual life involves so serious a loss, the beginning of a conscious soul life is a matter of the gravest importance. Those who work wisely with young children, come very near to showing God's own work of creation. * * * * * The mother makes the man; but close after the mother's influence comes the influence of the teacher through the years of childhood. * * * * * How then shall they most surely and wisely reach the life of the child for good?"

The answer to this question is most satisfactorily made by the introduction and incorporation into our free school system of the Kindergarten methods and practice. Perhaps I can give my readers the best idea of the subject by giving some slight account of the introduction and progress of this system in this country.

The introduction of Kindergartens in America is due largely, and it may be said, as far as I know, entirely to the benevolent zeal of Miss Elizabeth Peabody of Boston. Public attention to the subject was first awakened by this lady in an article published in the Christian Examiner, in 1838. In 1862 she published her Kindergarten Guide"; about this time she established her first "kindergarten," while about the same time other similar schools came into existence. Disappointment, however, was the outcome, for the real spirit and purport of the Kindergarten were not yet understood. The so-called "Kindergartens" were but little more than primary schools, combined with infant school plays and exercises.

After eight years of hard work and much disappointment Miss Peabody concluded to visit the then famous school of Froebel, the founder of the system in Germany, whence it has spread over Europe, and what she saw there was indeed a revelation to her. She also visited the Kindergarten of Madame Von Marien Holtz-Bulow, the colleague of Froebel in the great work; she thereafter returned to America, and bravely acknowledged that she had been a blind leader of the blind. She re-wrote and re-published the "Kindergarten Guide" giving the result of her investigations and experience; thenceforward the kindergarten system became an established fact, and everywhere new schools sprung up.

Wherever these schools have been established they have been a success from the start, and the question of their value—nay of their necessity—is no longer an open one; the idea of establishing a single one in connection with our public schools is simply ridiculous—as absurd as it would be to start a manufactory by pouring upon a great wheel a pailful of water, or turning on the contents of a puddle after a Summer shower.

Owing to the efforts of Miss Peabody and others the Kindergarten has become the foundation of the public school system in all the more intelligent and progressive cities of the Western States, such as Chicago, Milwaukee and the rest; in St. Louis they were first established by Professor Harris some time ago and there are now seventy-six Kindergartens connected with the public schools. In speaking of Kindergartens the report of the superintendent goes on to say "They are as much a part of the district schools as is any one of the other grades of the elementary school courses."

A benevolent and very intelligent lady, Miss Kate Douglass Wiggin of San Francisco, with the aid and co-operation of friends, has established fifty-seven Kindergartens in San Francisco and Oakland, besides a great many others up and down the Pacific coast, so that now the Pines of Lower California and the Indians of Alaska can, if they choose enjoy the benefits of the new education which are denied to children of our own city.

The Kindergartens did not form part of the public school system in Boston till about three years ago. In the mean time, after Miss Peabody had been called to other duties, Mrs. Quincy Shaw, daughter of the late Louis Agassiz, a "Lady Bountiful," of a princely generosity and abundant fortune established some fifteen or twenty Kindergartens for the benefit of the poorer children of the city, supporting them by her own means, until the school authorities out of very shame, one would think, felt called upon to take them off her hands, leaving her to find new channels of beneficence through which to pour her un-falling bounty.

There are now connected with the public schools of Boston between thirty and forty Kindergartens, and already their influence is sensibly perceived; one of their supervisors says, in a letter, "My own opinion is that if the province to train children so that their power of willing, planning and executing shall be developed and made effective, and their mental, moral and physical nature be cultivated and strengthened, Kindergartens must become an essential part of the system of public schools."

When this subject of popular education is receiving such attention the world over: when even at last conservative England is waking up to the necessity of free schools; the apathy and half-heartedness of our school-management are as disgraceful to those concerned as they are discouraging to the friends of reform; and they proceed from an unintelligence which the people will soon find it necessary to remove.

A few specimens of the beneficent work now going on have been shown above, and should interest the parents of this city in the impending reform; but it may be well to quote a few words from the most intelligent authorities on the subject:

Professor Edson says "The school of today is more and more understood to exist for the child, rather than the child for the school."

Professor Carpenter says "When we consider what the Kindergarten is able to do for the child, how important this new education becomes to all who are interested in the progress of civilization and religion.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Lothrop's Opera House.

The melo-drama, "The Ranch King" is being presented afternoon and evening at Lothrop's this week. As its name implies, it is a border drama, with a strong plot which holds the interest to the end of the fifth or last act. Miss Katherine Koler as Pug and Max Freeman as Donald McDonald share the leading honors. The funny dialogues of Murphy O'Donovan, played by Richard Lyle and Dan, a colored servant, played by John Phillips add variety and hence spice to the play. "My Mother in Law's Visit" precedes the drama.

Next week, the stock company of which Miss Kate Glassford is the leading lady and Mr. Chas. Barringer, the leading man, will play the romantic five-act melo-drama "Roland Romando." It is an interesting story of love, fortunes and missing heirs. The farce will be a "A Comfortable Home."

The Young Men's Christian Association course was given a brilliant opening Thursday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club, assisted by Miss Laura Burnham, soprano, and Mr. John Lloyd, tenor. Every number on the program was well chosen and excellently rendered. Miss Laura Burnham sang but twice, first, Jules Benedict's aria, "Carnival of Venice," which she sang at the recent festival, and second, with Mr. Lloyd, the Miserere from "Il Trovatore." The latter, one of the best numbers on the program fell flat on the audience. But with this exception the applause was very judiciously bestowed. Among the other numbers, Mons. Fred Rucquoy's flute solo, "Souvenir de Baden, one of his own compositions, and Mr. Arthur Laseur's cello solos, met with the most favor. The orchestral selections were without exception given excellent performances. The next entertainment in the course will be given by the Dudley Buck Quartet, the leading male quartet in the country, assisted by Mrs. Lucia Mead Priest, reader, who is well known in Worcester on account of her readings in the Association course last Winter.

The Art Students' Club will hold a meeting this evening when arrangements will probably be made for the semi annual exhibition which will be held during the week beginning Nov. 16.

We need not be much concerned about those faults, which we have the courage to own.

No One Knows.

[A lullaby with cradle accompaniment.]

Oh, no one knows

What a bird shall sing.

That nestles now

'Neath the mother's watchful wing.

Oh, no one knows

What fragrance shall fall,

From bursting buds

That swing on the rose-tree tall.

Oh, no one knows

When the dawn is new,

Where gleams shall glide,

Or what, in their gliding, do.

Ah, no one knows

What a soothing song,

My babe shall breathe

With the wand'ring years along.

Ah, no one knows

What my rose shall shed,

Of sweet incense,

Or how, in her tender tread.

Ah, no one knows

My sleeping sun-beam's fate,

Sleep, little heart,

We can but wonder and wait.

(She sleeps.)

Sleep, sleep, little heart.

No one, save God, knows thy fate.

Sleep, sleep, little heart.

We can but pray Him and wait.

—Helen Worthington Rogers.

Miss Elizabeth Kilham whose scores of little folks remember as the ever kind and pleasant kindergarten teacher in Mrs. Morgan's school, on account of continued illness has been obliged to return to her home in Beverly.

Mr. Whiting Eames of No. 4 Dix Street is visiting his sisters in Ashland. Concerning these ladies, it is interesting to note that though quite advanced in life they have never used a cooking stove; but under the paternal roof they have used the old fashioned fire place. For some reason, they have recently determined to fall in line with modern ways and to use a stove. For years, their home and their cooking have been noteworthy features in the town. Nothing could be better than the food prepared by them and when the Ladies Circle met with them, there never was lack of numbers. There are many who will regret the close of the fire-place.

Burnett—Knowlton.

Miss Maud Knowlton, daughter of Samuel Knowlton, baggage-master at the Union station, and herself a graduate of the High School, was married last Wednesday, by the Rev. Dr. Almon Gunnison, to Mr. George W. Burnett of this city. The wedding was at 30 Newbury street, the bride's home. Miss Annie Burnett was bridesmaid, and Mr. William Morrison, groomsmen. Grace Gurnea of Boston was maid of honor while Arthur Ross and Will Dadman were ushers. The bride was dressed in white India silk, brocaded front with pearl ornaments. The bridesmaid wore pink silk. Many and valuable presents were received. Mr. Burnett, who is a draughtsman, and his wife after a short wedding trip will reside at 40 Oread Street.

Mrs. J. M. Leiper of Tablequah, Indian Territory, daughter of Henry M. Smith, is, with her infant son, at Mr. Smith's home on Forest Avenue.

We found our former special sale of low priced Handkerchiefs immensely popular.

They were all gone before our friends were served, and since then we have been on the lookout for more.

We've got them—

The same kind as before.

2500 Handkerchiefs, pretty printed borders, At the old price.

Nineteen cents a dozen, or 2c for the single one.

600 only for gentlemen; these are white, and full size.

The same price—nineteen cents a dozen, 2 c each.

Ladies bought these by the two, three and five dozen; they're very good.

At the same department, you'll find lovely fancy Ties, with bolting cloth ends, hand printed, Silk fringed.

Don't think they are high cost, for they are the reverse; 37 1/2 c each, all you are asked for them.

There's something new in Madras Ties, 36 inches long, that will cost you only 19c each, instead of 37c they're advertised for by some dealers.

Nothing like the incessant demand for our TRAY CLOTHS.

At the beginning, we thought 50 dozen of them at 12 1/2c would be a large lot to sell in Worcester, but they were so pretty and so good that already HUNDREDS of dozens have been sold, and the call for more is as eager as ever.

Fashion.

Face veils are worn with small, close-fitting hats, and are deservedly popular, as they lessen the harsh effects, and give a finished look to the head dress. To be chic, a veil must cover the chin and be caught up high at the back of the hat. The newest designs show cobweb patterns and dots of gilt, silver or jet. A pretty one has a border of four satin lines medium-sized spots of what appears to be black straw. Coarse-meshed veils in either black or colors, show the complexion to better advantage than fine, closely-woven ones.

Elaborate Adornment

on corsages with plain skirts, has indeed by no means passed away and fancy runs riot among yokes, plastrons, guimpes, corselets, vests or transferable additions in chiffon or light quality silk. While skirts hang plainly and close to the form, there are considerable differences nevertheless in detail and new ideas as to shape. The French model all in one with a bias seam down the back, has obtained much favor and a stylish skirt shows the back breadth set in diagonally to form a point at the top with bias folds pendant below. Fin de Siècle skirts are made crosswise of the goods and without a seam except in the back. The slashing of skirts to show another material below, is likewise in vogue and so is the placing of a shorter one over a longer one in Maquerite style, yet without the characteristic side draping. Straight skirts of five breadths gathered in front and very full at the back are in direct opposition to the close bell or sheath skirts that are still made.

Violet powder is made of wheat starch, in the proportion of six pounds to one pound of powdered orris, one-fourth ounce attar of lemon, one dram each of bergamot and cloves.

The favorite materials for the season's dress wraps are plush and velvet, but heavy armure, ottoman, bengaline and gros grain silk. Bedford cloth and matelassé are not far behind. The latter is having quite a revival and is seen in white and black colors. The Bedford cord used is very thick and handsome and of rather wide rib. Some of the most elegant evening wraps are made of velvet brocade satin. All the wraps are lined with such lovely material that the inside is almost prettier than the outside.

Pitch upon that course of life, which is the most excellent, and habit will render it the most delightful.

Worcester Business.

Whatever may be the repute of our city in an intellectual way, however many churches and school houses we may have, the money for maintaining these comes from the business that, in one form or another, keeps humming wheels in motion, drives all sorts of projects to successful ends and makes of Worcester, a city known far beyond the borders of Massachusetts. Again, very many Worcester people, well posted as a rule, are entirely ignorant of the magnitude of some of the enterprises that are located in our midst. For instance, how many are aware that on Central Street carry the heaviest stock of marble, granite and freestone monuments in New England? Not alone the largest in Worcester, but the most extensive in this part of the Union? Take a walk down Central Street, some day, to No. 131 and inspect what is done and what is doing there. First it is well to know the men that make up the firm.

Evans & Company

Arthur M. Evans, who is the founder of the business, was born in 1832, in Piermont, Grafton County, N. H., on the banks of the Connecticut, but like many other New Hampshire boys, he followed the stream southward and, twenty years ago, began in Worcester, the business since grown to such extensive dimensions. The first location was on Washington Street, near the old Providence station. Thence it was moved to Washington Square, then to Brackett Court, next back to the square, and, in 1880, it made the final move to Central Street absorbing the business of Thomas Tateum.

Henry F. Stedman is Worcester born and reared. His birth place was on Green Street, but when he was very young his parents removed to Salem Street where his home continued till his recent removal to Powdoin Street. He has been in the marble business since 1874 and since 1880 with Mr. Evans.

Herbert E. Chandler is also New Hampshire born, from Alstead, but he has been in Worcester and in this business for a long time. He is a member of the firm to represent its interests abroad. He is on the road most of the time.

To keep their forty men employed every device known in the art of stone cutting is introduced. They have five machines for working granite alone. Here may be seen gang and single saws working their way through vast, solid rock masses. Here is an immense revolving single mill stone, apparently, but a stone whose utility is devoted to what is above rather than under. By constant dropping and rubbing the stone is worn and fashioned till it assumes the desired shape. There is nothing in the way of monumental stone that this company cannot furnish; all grades of foreign stones and of domestic. Every New England state is represented. Maine sends all shades from its famous black to the extremely light. In New Hampshire, at Fitzwilliam, they work a quarry of their own. From Vermont they get the Barre stone. In Massachusetts, they make a specialty of the Rockport variety and also use a deal of Quincy. Rhode Island sends up her Westerly and Cumberland granite. Their marble is chiefly from Vermont, though some comes from Tennessee. The Canadian Provinces, also, are drawn upon for material. Among noteworthy local monuments are the Hedden stone in Hope Cemetery; the Sugden, in Spencer; George S. Barton's and E. A. Goodnow's in Rural; and those of Ex-Mayor George F. Verry and S. R. Leland. The firm has put up many memorial tablets in town halls and library buildings. In our own High School, they placed on the walls of the main corridor the tablets to the memory of the High School boys who died in the Rebellion, and also constructed the busts of Grant and Grout, standing just before the tablets. The tablets and Grant's bust came from the generosity of E. A. Goodnow, the bust of Grout from the G. A. R. Andrew O'Connor was the sculptor of both figures as he was, also, of an admirable medallion of John B. Gough, still in the company's possession. Evans & Co. were bidders for the statue and monument of General Israel Putnam at Brooklyn, Conn., and the designs they presented were far better than those accepted but our Nutmeg brethren did not care to let the job go out of the state, consequently Worcester lost it.

The company does a great deal in interior work in public and private buildings. The sumptuous entrance to the Y. M. C. A. building, and that of the Burnside Building were laid by this firm. Also they did the tiling in Jonas Clark's Elm Street residence and the marble work for the Forrest building, on Main Street. These are examples only in the long list of elegant work done by them.

Should the visitor look through the works, he would find an immense assortment of monumental work ready, save the cutting of names, a range rising from the cost of a very few dollars to an outlay of many hundreds. The drift, today, for cemetery purposes is towards the massive and substantial.

Our climate will not admit of delicate statuary and carving, especially in marble, so here in these works may be seen the choicest monuments in granite as enduring as anything can be. Of course, marble of all kinds may be had and much of it is sold and placed, but when a considerable expenditure is made, a harder material is preferred. To the student of Lithology, the stone yard offers excellent facilities, for here are gathered specimens from diverse quarters, that otherwise he would have to travel far to find.

There is another consideration that goes far with the purchaser. He is assured of the very fairest and most courteous usage in his negotiations. Evans & Co. have something to sell, and they propose to put their wares out in such a way as to secure attention and patronage. Their customers come again. What better comment could be made on any man's business dealings?

So Romantic.

The marriage, Wednesday, of Hon. Jos. H. Walker's son, George, to Miss Pearl Mendenhall in Greensboro, N. C., may be ascribed to Mr. Walker's intimacy with the bride's brother in Brown University, where they were chums. Many a happy life partnership has begun in this way. College friends love to talk of home dear ones. A visit to a chum's home frequently results in the exchange of hearts. The newly wedded people will come to Worcester about the middle of next month.

From the enthusiasm of the people in their cemetery scheme, it is evident that they intend to stay.

The Anatomy of "Creeds."

If the word "critic" is a term of reproach, a book fitted to some contumelious eye, carping, malignant, aggressive, or kindred epithets, I am loth to glorify the rool with which Mr. Powell might be eudged, provided he were guilty of this literary lapse—"I love truth too much to make it unpleasant by use" of it ha'sh," as Rose Terry Cook's "living epistle," was wont to say, and "I don't think 'tis meant for a club to knock folks down with, nor to be flung at 'em like a stone. I believe it's the best thing in the world to do and say, and I do 'no' why it shouldn't be the pleasantest,"—a pleasant so effect, not hurtful!

Mr. Powell in LIGHT, October 17th, through the publishers of "Liberty and Life," explained and admits his adaption of the poem "What is his Creed?" and does he forthwith change the title to "Creeds?" Or was it a prior éleve? Mr. Powell says:—"I certainly never intended to claim it as mine.—Hope the author does not imagine I ever sought to claim it." Although quotation marks were present, we deprecate the infringement—whether by Mr. Powell's adoption or another's—in more, than one instance, of a few lines from one true verse to complete another, discarding the unhappy remainder. Also the eliminations of words, and transpositions throughout the six stanzas; omitting in every instance the safety index, stars. A most natural conclusion is reached from Mr. Powell's letter that he "found the poem or a part of it in a newspaper scrap, liked it," mended it, reflecting that he would perhaps "Give the manikin three legs for one—(Or pluck the other off, and leave him like an egg.

And lessened, he was mine and merely clay."

then placed his signature at the end, hoping the author would not imagine he sought to claim it, "I liked it and used it,"—he avers. In this, Mr. Powell paid a most delicate tribute to the unknown hand "lifted up to strengthen the feeble knees," but if the lines were fit for service, the poem was fit to survive without the work of supererogation. What would Mr. Powell imagine should one of his creations meet the same treatment and appear before him clad in a clerical gown, and topped with a "Derby," bearing the legend, "Who of myself has robbed me?" Mr. Powell's disinterestedness must not be depreciated through which he sought experimentally to select the desirable portions of the true poem for the edification of his readers. It is quite possible that Mr. Powell is innocent of the offence which must rest at somebody's door, 'tis very evident, and it was sanguinely expected his exoneration would come in the recent letter, at once freeing minds from speculation. "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in the thing which he alloweth." It is admitted that the fractional "Creeds" under doubt, was decanted from "What is his Creed?" quite regardless of ruffling sensibilities with mis-fitting lines, like mis-mated stockings. It is difficult to convince the majority, of the impropriety of mutilating literary work for the sake of adaptation, albeit the author is unknown and the pennon "copyrighted," is not unfurled on the margin; nor does the absence of Henry Van Dyke, D. D., with his "National Sin of Literary Piracy," insure immunity. N. P. Willis and Washington Irving, are not hard upon the heels of literary free-booters of this period, as in an earlier defence of a certain story in the Sketch Book, which appeared under a different title in a foreign paper, for "something quite original and very anonymous."

Walter Besant's romance "Amoré of Lyonesse" yields a graphic touch to a similar situation, Robert Burton, with his "Anatomy of Melancholy," gives a celebrated precedent and Dr. Ferrier detected the plagiarism of "Tristram Shandy." Where to-day, is the modern policeman Howells with his lantern? Without a given example of the original poem and its "double," (see LIGHT Sept. 19, Oct. 3, Oct. 17) it may appear to the uninitiated, that criticism of a man superior in literary prominence is an impertinence, even if he be not a futility, and quite fail to awaken moral sentiment into a general sense of equity, which is a line of thought, a point of view that is struggling to make itself felt and seen just now; this sense of equity must be embodied in a law of equal protection for all men in possession of their intellectual property.

"Sure the shovel and tongs
To each other belongs."

And in the same sense it is not fair to divorce one half of a literary creation and unite it to a third. There are certain limitations which a quoter must recognize, certain moral obligations to heed should he possess even a literary conscience. The value of quotation as a garnish is undeniable, as every writer knows, and the privilege to liberally quote,—if he correctly and honestly quotes, is tenable. If others' words are good why use poorer, some one has suggested? It has been said: "Next to the originator of a good sentence is the first quoter of it;" again, there is not less wit, nor less invention in applying rightly a thought one finds in a book than in being the first author of that thought." Cardinal de Perron has been heard to say that the happy application of a verse of "Virgil" has deserved a talent. Up to this date the originator of this poem has not materialized, neither has his literary executor brought suit. Perhaps the spinner is a woman whose modesty restrains her as claimant of the fabric, the texture of which Mr. Powell liked only in part, we assume, and which somebody might pilfer, as the artist medals his dim canvas to bring out, or brighten duB figures. Perhaps the possible site is grateful to be shown when to dilate, as Rufus Choate's daughter used to nudge her father at the opera, that he might not dilate with the wrong emotion. J. E. L.

NEW WARES

From everywhere. Almost every ocean steamer brings us something. Every day new openings reveal new beauties. Now an invoice of rare China. Again, fine Cut Glass, rich Bric-a-brac or Silver. They crowd so fast one upon another that special mention is not to be thought of.

ONE SMALL

Consignment just received is so unique and dainty we ask for it particular examination.

"SILVER BRONZE"

Is not widely known. It is a new product. Never was artist metal workers' skill more fully shown than in these few examples of their art. For delicacy and lightness of effect they are not surpassed by more pretentious works.

THE NAME

"Corham" and words "Solid Silver" were are inseparably connected. The name stands for all that is good and beautiful in Sterling Silver. Pioneers in the business, they have always set a rapid pace for competition. Modelling their own designs, ever depending upon their own and their workmen's talents, they have for years stood foremost in this industry.

IT IS BECAUSE

We know and we know that wares of their make are always what they pretend to be that we select their goods for sale. Others may make—probably do make—just as good. In their case it's a matter of absolute knowledge.

ALTHOUGH WE

Are always ready to right any wrong, we don't want any wrong to occur. Better have your silver, at least, right at first. None so safe as "CORHAM" Manufacturing Co.'s make.

THE SALE

Of Gray and Blue and White Enamelled Ware (Kitchen Dept.) has been even greater than we expected. People had a "little taste" of it only, before. Ready for a good big piece now. Cheap as the last lot—and better. Only for the coming week. Don't forget that. Assortment somewhat broken now, but good yet.

Household.

Many of my readers own really pretty pictures which are hardly choice enough to merit an expensive frame. Will such please try the following pretty frames, which have a decidedly "shop" look, and not that objectionable air which marks the work of the 'prentice hand?

Make a rough board foundation—no matter if a little uneven, if strong. Cover this smoothly with old curtain lace—the only particular part of it is to make this lace cover entirely smooth and free from wrinkles. Now give it a couple of coats of shellac; when perfectly dry, gild it; if not bright enough to be satisfactory the first time, give it a second coat. The result will be a really beautiful frame, if carefully made.

Here is a suggestion for any one who has experienced the inconvenience, when travelling, of having to put her sponge or wash cloth and toothbrush into her trunk or bag before they have time to dry. Make an oil silk bag in this fashion: Take a piece of silk ten or twelve inches square. On opposite edges stitch a piece of folded silk or ribbon to form a casing. Lay these edges together and sew up the sides of the bag. Run a drawing string in the casing of narrow tape or ribbon, cord or bobbin. You can put your damp sponge or toothbrush into this without any fear that it will injure the neighboring articles in your trunk. Turn it inside out and air when you have an opportunity.

It is not generally known that poultices made of Indian meal are excellent for application in cases of sudden attack of pleurisy pneumonia, or inflammation of the bowels. The poultices are made in the form of hot mush; if one part mustard is added to four parts it will excite moderate irritation of the skin without blistering. A quick application will often prevent serious results. D.

When a patient is suffering from fever, and the skin is hot and dry, a salaratus bath will give temporary relief. This bath can be given in bed without removing the bed-clothes or the patient's clothing. Use warm water with the salaratus dissolved in it, in proportion of two tablespoonfuls to a quart of water; wet a clean soft sponge in this and squeeze it dry that there will be no danger of dripping; bath a small portion of the body at a time and dry quickly with a soft towel. While using the sponge with one hand, use the other to keep the clothes from touching the sponge.

A Good Cough Syrup.

This is a simple syrup which anyone can make and its beneficial properties consist in the fact that it furnishes carbon to the blood faster than the lungs can consume it. This makes it valuable in cases of lung trouble. The way to make it is: one pound of figs, dried or fresh, one pound of dates, one-half pound rock candy, one ounce fresh or dried sage leaves, one gallon water (soft). Cut the dates and figs small add the sage, and put in the water; simmer slowly until the water is reduced to one quart, then strain and bottle and cork tightly. Take a spoonful whenever a desire to cough is felt. The sage heals the soreness and is good for night sweats, the figs purify the blood and the dates and sugar make a supply of carbon that is good for the lungs. This has been tested and found always to give relief, and always cures if the lungs are not too much diseased. D.

A Late Song.

This is the friend we knew last summer.

Heigh-ho, heigh-ho!

Now, who would know

That this brown stalk was a lovely comer

To morning choruses gladly heard

In the leafy halls of the summer bird?

A stalk and a leaf much worse for weather.

Heigh-ho, heigh-ho!

Now, who would know

That once we sported a day together,

And parted only when twilight lay

Too deep for household hearts to stray

Then was a blossom brightly swinging.

Heigh-ho, heigh-ho!

Say, who would know

In days of summer bloom and singing

That the lights of home so much more bright

Would shine when the fields are frost and blight

Woman's Club.

The regular meeting of this body, Wednesday afternoon, was devoted to the consideration of Kindergartens. Mrs. Sarah A. Henshaw took charge of the discussions which began by a paper read by Mrs. Mary C. Harris on the origin of the system. Next Mrs. Emma E. Foster discussed the moral value of the Kindergarten. Third, Mrs. Emma Butler gave an account of the planting and growth of Kindergartens in this country. Finally Mrs. Katharine C. Higgins gave an outline of public opinion on the subject. During the discussion that followed, State Agent A. W. Edson spoke as did Probation Officer Col. E. J. Russell, Miss Willise of Boston, Mrs. Luther M. Lovell, Mrs. I. J. Lansing and Dr. G. F. Balcom of the school committee. There was very little difference of opinion, nearly all agreeing that the system should be added to our public schools.

Indiscretion is an evidence of weakness; for it evinces either a want of capacity to apprehend what is best, or a want of energy to pursue it.

Into the darkness comes the day,
But not with a sudden burst of splendor;
The shadows are slowly driven away

Is Massachusetts drunken?

A paper of extensive circulation printed in Boston, has openly asserted this!

More than in any other state in the Union, the people of Massachusetts are crowded into cities and large towns. Temptation is correspondingly common.

The drink curse is on every hand. Treating is the order of the day. Mistaken generosity calls for many more draughts than the original visit intended. It is not a question of quenching thirst. It is keeping up a "Good fellow" reputation.

Watch the "dinner-pail" brigade as it files down, at night fall, from the shops north of Lincoln Square and see how many men and boys drop into the saloons along the north end of Main street. Homes are impoverished there. Children go hungry and ragged because of these halts.

How these laboring men, who should be the pride of our city, struggle for places as they take their perpendicular drinks! These few moments on their return from labor are worth more to the rumseller than all the rest of the day. How the money is swept into the capacious till, while unpaid grocers and market men may clamor in vain for their pay.

"I don't have much to do with politics" says a Main street market man, "but I notice that in No License years men have money for meat who seldom buy at other times or if they do they want it charged." This is the general verdict of those who deal in the necessities of life, yet to satisfy the demands of the drink seller, our city votes to license the traffic.

And what is the record for six months of legalized wrong doing? What has the saloon done for us? The array of arrests is nearly three to one as against those of one year ago. In 1890, there had been 777 arrests for drunkenness up to November 1st. In 1891, the list is swollen to 2153. Still that antediluvian croaker turns up, saying, "There's just as much rum drunken without as with License." He has no head for figures and no mind for facts.

Much is hoped from the organization of business men, recently effected whose object is the wiping out of the saloon. They do not attempt to enter the home and say what a man shall eat or drink, but they are thoroughly in earnest as to the damning character of the saloon and they propose to have the nuisance abated. It is a menace to business. It renders our homes unsafe. It wars against civilization. Only those engage in the saloon business who long since were willing to coin their blood in drachmas, if thereby they might acquire wealth.

"Oh thou accursed thirst of gold what dost thou not prompt the heart of man to do"? The Mantuan Bard expressed aright, ages ago, the prevailing motive in many of the affairs of men. The love of money is the root of all evil," is the Biblical sentiment familiar to all. Take away from the traffic the money that it returns and the horrors, incident to it, would drive away every dealer. The chink of the coin drowns the groan of the starving and, leaving moral reflections to a later hour, the drink seller plies his nefarious business. Will it ever end?

Massachusetts has decided to erect for her State building at the World's Fair a model of the old John Hancock mansion of colonial days, and it is probable that Virginia will erect one after the style of Mount Vernon or Monticello. If other states follow this example the architecture at the fair will be a historical exposition in itself of no mean importance.

What an admirable idea! Should each state in the Union do thus, what an object lesson the exhibition would present! It would bring out a deal of historical research in every state as to whether it really contained an edifice worthy of preservation.

It seems not a little queer that Massachusetts should have gone along more than a hundred years without her present system of quiet, uninfluenced elections! Contrast Tuesday last with the voting days of four years ago! Then a long array of ward heelers, earning a paltry stipend, shouting the names of certain candidates; now, the polling place is as quiet and orderly as a church. It has liberated the voter. Lincoln's Proclamation proclaimed liberty to the Black Race. The Australian Ballot has disenthralled every voter of whatever race, creed or color.

Some months ago, certain enterprising young men, piano makers moved their business from Westboro to Amboy, Ill., on the usual consideration of great inducements, plant, financial aid, etc. As usual, the matter ends in the discomfiture of the gentlemen and they are ready to come back East. Coddling is not always the best way to help along a growing enterprise. This hiring to locate in a certain place is poor business policy. It is bad in every way.

Churchill—Richards.

James H. Churchill, B. S., son of James K. Churchill, himself a patent expert in Boston was married, Thursday, in Somerville, to Miss Nellie M. Richards of the latter city. Only the immediate friends of the young people were present.

General Truman Seymour.

This Union officer, who died Saturday last, had an exceedingly wide experience. Born in Burlington, Vt., Sept. 25, 1824, he was graduated from West Point in 1846. He saw service in Mexico, coming home a brevet captain. From 1850 to '53 he was instructor in drawing at West Point. He fought against the Seminoles in Florida and he helped Anderson defend Fort Sumpter in 1861. He was McCall's chief of artillery, till in 1862 he was made a brigadier general of volunteers. All through the Peninsular and Virginia campaigns of 1862, he did excellent service till he was transferred to the South. He was on Folly and Morris Islands, and commanded the unsuccessful assault on Fort Wagner, where he was severely wounded. He was in Florida in 1864 and commanded at Olustee. In March he returned to Virginia and May 5th took command of the 2d Brigade, 3d Division of the Sixth Army Corps, and the next day was captured in the Wilderness. In Charleston, as a prisoner, he was exposed to the Federal fire from Morris Island. Exchanged, Aug. 9, he participated in the Valley campaign, succeeding Ricketts in command of the 3d Division of the Sixth Corps. He was at Petersburg, Sailor's Run and the Surrender. Since his muster out from active service in 1876, he has resided chiefly in Europe, dying in Florence, Italy. Though a brave officer, he had not the affection of his soldiers. LIGHT well remembers a day's march in Virginia, when the war was over, where man after man was overcome by heat and fatigue, just that Seymour might say that his lead had beaten that of the day before. He was severe on stragglers, but one not over bright fellow of a New York regiment made even Seymour smile. The soldier was going as he pleased, when Seymour called out to him, "Who are you and where do you belong?" The stray, without the slightest change in his pace replied, "Private Harris, Sixth Corps, by ———!" The general said no more, but the saucy answer became a regimental byword, thereafter.

The Prussian cavalry officer, of whom the following story is told, did not intend to be cheated out of a share of the glory of such a death. It was after the battle of Gravelotte, the bloodiest fight of the Franco-German War of 1870. The cavalry officer badly wounded himself, was greatly annoyed by the cries of some wounded soldiers lying near him. At last being unable longer to control himself, he testily called out: "Stop your howling over there! Do you think you're the only ones killed in the fight?"

Ex-Congressman Martin, of Texas, says, that during his four years in Washington he never allowed his expenses to exceed $50 a month. He takes home with him quite a respectable fortune saved from his salary.

That magnificent offer for War Memoirs, with Cosmopolitan and LIGHT, is still in force. Viz., $5 pays for LIGHT, Cosmopolitan and a set of Grant's, Sherman's, Sheridan's or McClellan's Memoirs.

"The Tam-Tam." This is the name of the new High School paper, gotten up under the direction of Masters Gray and Woodward. It is exceedingly bright and gossipy, but it seems too bad that the boys must peddle it out on Maple and Walnut streets. By the way, isn't there something peculiar about that name, "Tam-Tam." Referring to Grimm's Law and using it's corresponding vocal we shall have just the sentiments of the boys over the restriction which keep them out of the school house. But they needn't fret, that bar will soon be let down along with all the others that were so ostentatiously put up in the Fall of 1889. This one is retained only to keep the curse on or off, just as the public chooses to regard the matter. In any event, success to the boys!

The Cosmopolitan comes to LIGHT, all the way from Sidney, New South Wales, Australia. It is made up of parallel columns of Volapük and English. It is printed in the interests of this new venture in language and must be exceedingly valuable to those who are trying to master its details. It is, by far, the largest and best publication in that line.

"The Livingstone" of Livingstone College, Salisbury, N. C., is pleased to express some very pleasing sentiments concerning LIGHT. For these happy words, thanks are returned and best wishes are extended for the success of the college and its representative paper. Under President Price, its advance is sure and steadfast.

The November Calendar of the Church of the Sacred Heart has been received. Immortelles are the flowers for the month. Special attention is called to the Catholic Young Women's Society. The Pastor's hand is evident throughout. A souvenir, Christmas number is promised for next month.

The Worcester County Philatelist is the title of a new Quarterly just from the press of Walter L. Brown. It contains the Constitution and By Laws of the Worcester County Philatelic Association, with several very interesting contributions on stamp collecting. Typographically the eight paged paper is a great credit to Mr. Brown who has taken time from his busy life to set the type and do the press work. Success to the paper and to the society. The president is G. Stewart Dickinson, an omniverous collector for years; Vice President, A. C. Woodward; Secretary, E. H. Marble who is also a sort of omnium gatherum and Treasurer, Walter L. Brown. Meetings are held twice a month.

LIGHT acknowledges obligation to Mr. O. B. Wood for the use of his engraving of the Common. It originally appeared in his Worcester Illustrated, an exceedingly valuable publication, still to be had of him at his Maple street place of business.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY.

DEAR LIGHT :

I read with great interest your article on the ancient milestones, and the picture image you presented seemed like the familiar face of some well remembered friend of my boyhood. As you solicit further information on the subject, I would say that one exact counterpart stands by the road-side at Long Meadow, and another at Windsor Hill in Connecticut. You say one gentleman thinks he has read in ancient lore, that they were planted by Provincial Enactment, but if it does not go back far enough, there is a record in a much more ancient book, dating back some eighteen hundred years and more, of Moses having much to do with "tablets of stone;" but no knowledge to the contrary may be prima facie evidence of the fact. But as there is no one of Moses' time resident in this country (Samuel Porter and Caleb Wall coming in at a later date), it would be impossible to prove the fact by any living witness. But one fact we are sure of,—that whenever or by whom ever planted, like our flag they "are still there." Perhaps like Topsy they "grewed there." The one on Lincoln Street must have been the very one upon which two Irish tramps halted mistaking it for a tombstone, when one said reverently to the other, "Tread lightly Pat, here lies Miles Boston, aged 42."

We know not! and knowing not we know,
"A little knowledge is a dangerous thing."

Society of Antiquary.

The last meeting in the old quarters was held Tuesday night. Little was done save routine business, though the attendance was the largest in many a month. President Crane made reminiscent remarks as did Daniel Seagrave. The rooms were opened in 1877 and the first book belonging to the Society was exhibited. It is a copy of "Worcester in the Revolution" compiled and presented by A. A. Lovell, one of the earliest members of the society. The library has grown to more than 40,000 books and pamphlets, while the museum of relics excels in interest anything in New England, outside of Boston. Franklin P. Rice presented an interesting summary of work done by the organization, a summary that reflects no little credit on all concerned. Treasurer Stedman, the seventh man to join the body, also referred to the beginnings. Messrs Estey and Maynard indulged in similar verses. Rev. Charles E. Simmons presented a pair of baby shoes, made in England, and worn by the late Hon. Stephen Salisbury in his early infancy. Their history is complete. Librarian Dickinson called attention to some gifts from the estate of the late John B. Gough, the most interesting of which is a cane from the hull of Commodore Perry's flagship, Lawrence, presented to him in 1876. The head is made from a cabin door knob of the same vessel. President Crane referred to the recent death of the Society's first Vice-President, Mr. Albert Tolman, and Hon. Clark Jilson was appointed to prepare a proper memorial of his life. Plans were discussed for removing the library and museum to the new hall at Lincoln Square. However much better the new quarters may be, they can hardly secure any more faithful and valuable work than that done in the old Foster Street rooms.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

A very large number of friends of the Cecilia Ladies Quartet gathered last week Friday evening in Association Hall in response to invitations to a recital sent out by the quartet. About one year ago Mrs. E. H. Plaisted, Mrs. L. M. Davis, Miss Lillian Whittemore and Miss Annie Dean formed this organization and sang at various concerts and recitals last Winter, meeting with deserved success. In fact, there was but one point which could be criticised, which was that their repertoire of pieces was very limited. But during the Summer the ladies have done lots of hard study and as a starter for the season's work they decided to give a recital, to which their friends should be invited. They secured the assistance of Prof. George W. Blish, of the Blish School of Elocution, Boston; Miss Bessie Holmes, violinist; Mr. W. A. Anderson, basso, and Mr. Charles H. Groat, pianist. The program promised an exceedingly pleasant evening. But, just before the recital was to begin, it was announced that Mrs. Plaisted was unable to sing a note on account of a severe cold and consequently the first number by the quartet was omitted and the program began with the violin solo, andante, from violin concerto, Mendessohn, by Miss Holmes. She also played later Sarasate's Spanish Dance, No. 8, and won generous applause for both selections. Prof Blish recited very effectively four scenes from Macbeth and several humorous selections. Mr. Groat, besides acting as accompanist, played Paderewski's Polonaise, opus 9. Mr. W. A. Anderson sang Pinsuti's Love Song and, with the Cecilia Quartet, Mrs. Webster Thayer kindly taking Mrs. Plaisted's place, sang Gaul's List' the Cherubic Host. The program was concluded with two songs by Brahms, sung by the quartet.

Madame Laura Scherer-Mapleson, who is to appear in concerts at Mechanics Hall Thanksgiving afternoon and evening under the management of Mrs. Lillie Wilkinson is described as "one of the most beautiful women ever born under the American Flag."

Madame Mapleson has sung before all the crowned heads of Europe with great artistic success and her reappearance in Boston, Oct. 13, was but a repetition of her former triumphs. She chose to present her great success, "Lucia di Lammermoor," by Donizetti, in which she made her European debut at Pisa in 1884, where she received the following complimentary criticism: "It must honestly be admitted that her execution is faultless, and the ease with which she sings is perfectly captivating. The neatness and elegance of her style combined with the sweetness of her voice and perfect intonation, at once proclaim her an artist of the greatest promise."

Since then the range of her voice has been extended up and down so that it now embraces a compass of two and a half octaves.

Madame Mapleson will be assisted by a first class concert company and entertainments of rare musical enjoyment may be expected.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Roland Romando," a romantic melo drama, has been favorably received by large audiences at Lothrop's Opera House during the past week. Mr. Charles Barringer, as Roland Romando, made a handsome and dashing hero, being particularly admired by the feminine portion of the audience. He is a talented artist, never showing that self-consciousness which often mars the genius of a good actor. Miss Kate Glassford, as Fabrianette, is a good actress, but the unfortunate possessor of a poor voice. Mr. Charles I. Fannin as Waldron Warren, an old man who has sinned but repented, and who wrongs his son through misrepresentation and at the instigation of Willard Burford, who is the enemy of everything true and virtuous, was very good. Mr. Rowe as the son and Mr. Colby as the villain did excellent work. Mr. Francis Kingdon, as the cool, calculating and unscrupulous Dr. James, won much favor. He makes a good stage appearance. The rest of the company were fairly clever.

A laughable farce entitled "A Comfortable Home," precedes each performance. Mr. and Mrs. Bowser, who have something of a national reputation for making home sweet home, a seventh heaven, are very funny.

The cut in prices by the management of the Exchange Street Theater is no surprise to the theater-going public who have been acquainted with the true state of affairs. It is occasioned by the competition caused by the phenomenal success of Lothrop's Opera House in presenting first-class entertainments at popular prices. Many of the best attractions at the former place of amusement since this season have been compelled to play to small audiences.

Manager Dale Armstrong, of Lothrop's Opera House, is convalescing from a severe attack of nervous prostration caused by overwork.

Brass vs. Wind.

A prominent Worcester manufacturer, using a deal of brass in his business, was lately overheard trying to form a co partnership with one of the city's best known and most successful solicitors, claiming that the latter could furnish all the brass necessary for an extensive plant without, in the least, reducing his stock. This was very good till the solicitor resorted to the effect that brass could not mingle advantageously, with pure unadulterated wind.

Bryant.

The 3d of November, our last election day, was the anniversary of Bryant's birth. He was born in 1759 and more than thirteen years have sped away since he had his real Thanatopsis. Yet so fully have we become imbued with his thoughts and verse that he yet seems to be with us and of us. His venerable face and snowy locks are fresh in memory.

The Great Essential in Teaching.

The great essential of a teacher of any degree dwells within himself. He may not be so deeply learned as many others, but if he imparts knowledge with simplicity and directness and keeps his students interested, he can do better work than others who are more scholarly. The enthusiasm for particular studies which is imparted by the best educators is the great desideratum. A teacher likes to see the effect of his efforts, and they are at once perceptible where the personality is adapted to the work.

The boy who respects himself, is proud of his good name, speaks the truth and deals honestly with his fellows is in a measure proof against the unseen influences that break down character and lead to wrong-doing and to ruin. But he should not unnecessarily expose himself, and in that lies the value of the many proverbs that warn him against bad associations and evil communication.

The great defect of our American school-system, the lack of manual training, is thus handled by the Chicago Herald:

"Of two hundred and fifty firms exhibiting in the furniture exposition, one hundred and sixty are composed of men of foreign birth and training. The furniture trade—one of the most profitable and progressive in the country—is conducted by men who owe their success to European practical education. Not one of the leaders in the trade inherited a dollar. Yet they, in Chicago alone, produce an annual output worth twenty-five million dollars. The only industrial relation native Americans have to this vast industry is that of mechanics in the lowest grades of its manual labor. Almost all posts of responsibility, high compensation, and trained skill are held by foreign-born men.

In all European countries, manual training is a regular part of the primary-grade schooling. From the general primary school they pass to higher grades in which manual training is constantly maintained. If they can remain still longer in school they pass to the various technical or trades schools which abound in all continental cities and villages. The Old World apprentice system completes this education. Each of them learns a craft completely. Artisans of this type come to the United States by the thousand and take the places native Americans can not fill. Little by little they save enough to begin manufacturing on their own account or their skill is accepted as equivalent to capital in a firm, and they became partners. The European artisan is master of the business, because he knows every step in it.

"In our American primary-grade teaching, the few years the children of the poor have to spend in school is diffused over many surfaces, all literary. The children, uninterested, because the teaching is exclusively abstract, are glad to get away from school, even to go to work. Statistics show that seventy-eight per cent. of American children leave school forever without going higher than primary grades. We send them out with a little knowledge of reading and writing, nothing more. They go into factories, and, untaught manually, must take the lowest places and be content with the lowest wages, while, as they grow older, they find foreign-born artisans every year filling up the higher ranks. They remain mechanics without ever becoming artisans. Machinery and trades-union narrowness about the number and service of apprentices confirm their misfortune. Manual training ought to be a part of every day's work in every primary school."

High School.

Mrs. Jennie I. Ware, till recently, the highly successful teacher of History, English Literature and Botany in this school has entered upon her duties in the Roxbury High.

Mrs. Ware is not such a very long way from Mrs. Sanborn, who, also, was a very successful teacher here from 1876 for about seven years. She is in the Jamaica Plains High School.

Miss Nellie M. White who left the school last year, is finding her St. Louis home very pleasant. The middle of the continent appears to be very congenial and in every way the change is a desirable one.

Dr. Edwin T. Painter, who once taught Algebra in the school, and who located in Pittsburg, after his medical course, is in Worcester at the home of his father, Mr. Thomas Painter, on Home Street. He is slowly recovering from the effects of the Koch treatment received in Berlin last winter.

One of the lower windows looks as though the boys of Room 19 had indulged in an election row. Don't get in a hurry, young men, you will vote soon enough.

Where were the W. H. S. boys Tuesday night? They were missed in the pow wow raised by rival "Tech" and Holy Cross crowds. The time was when they made the welkin ring with their loud hurrahs.

The Tam Tam says the boys are doing a deal of smoking about the premises. Why is it so much worse for the boys to do what their elders are exceedingly given to? The fable of the crab applies.

When a waiter overturned the sliced tongue at the table, Dr. Porson pronounced it a lup sus lingua.

Sidney Smith once proposed as a motto for a manufacturer of table-sauces, a line from Virgil:

Gravi jandumum ranca cura.—Foed. iv. 1.

A scholar once wrote on his tea-chest, "T' docs," thou teachest!

When two malcontents, named Payne and Culpepper, were expelled from college, a classmate said, Poenia perire potest, Culpa perennis est."

Dr. Johnson wrote the following epitaph for his cat: "Mi-a! inter omnes."

A gentleman at dinner helped his friend to a potato, saying, "I think this is a mealy one." To which the other replied, "Thank you, it could not be me-li-er."

"Well Tom, you are sick again?" To which Tom answered, in good English and better Latin, "Sic sum."

When a lady once swept down a Cremona violin with her mantua, Dean Swift quoted Virgil as follows: "Mantua va misera: nimium vicina Cremona," which in English reads, "Ah, Mantua; too near the wretched Cremona."

Something similar was a friend's criticism upon one of Anna Dickinson's books, when he changed the title from "What Answer?" to "What an Answer!"

Boston University.

Pres. William F. Warren and Dr. M. L. Perrin, professor of German, represented the college at the meeting of the association of New England Colleges at Brown University Thursday.

The Upsilon Chapter of the Beta Theta Pi Fraternity held its annual initiation Thursday evening Oct. 29th. The banquet was at Cook's the following evening. Four Freshmen were initiated.

By the will of Lovicy D. Paddock of Boston the following public bequest is made. To Boston University, $30,000 for a trust fund, to be known as the Paddock Fund, the income only to be used, one half to be devoted to educating women who are earnest workers, and one-half paid poor young men who are striving to obtain a good education. The will provides that if any of the testator's kith and kin desire to be educated at the Boston University, they shall be given the preference in securing the benefits of the Paddock Fund.

Miss Annie Hadyn Webster delivered her first lecture to the students of the college on "Psychology and Physiology of Voice Production" Thursday afternoon in Jacob Sleeper Hall.

The Freshmen foot ball eleven plays the Marlboro Cycle Club at Marlboro next Saturday afternoon.

Librarian Samuel S. Green returned, Wednesday, from his California trip. He reports a very pleasant excursion. Everything possible, to relieve the tedium of travel was done by the railroad people and every city, visited, vied with every other one in making the call memorable. Mr. Green reached home just too late to vote but as there were more Mugwumps than Republicans on the train, the latter party will try to forgive him. He has been away five weeks, having left Worcester the 30th of September.

Free Institute.

The $60 lens and shutter which was offered by the Bausch and Lomb Optical Co., Rochester, N. Y., to the member of the Tech Camera Club making the best picture with it, has been awarded to A. C. Higgins, '93. This company has offered its lenses as prizes to all the different camera clubs throughout the state, to be competed for by the members. The company reserves all negatives in the competition, and the club whose member makes the best picture, receives an additional prize of $100. The contest in the Tech Camera Club closed November 1st. The contestants were Messrs. Higgins, Sinclair, Vaill and Kent of '93, Bracken, '92, and Fitts, '91. The judges were Dr. Kimball, J. O. Phelon and photographer Florin. The successful picture was a snap shot of a horse trot at the last New England Fair. Mr. Higgins also had the second best—a group of children at play. All these pictures and many others taken by members the past season, are to be displayed next month at the Annual Exhibit of the Club. A committee consisting of Messrs. Keith, Higgins, Sinclair and Kent has been appointed to arrange for it. An exhibition of lantern slides is also proposed for the same evening, the whole probably to take place at the Salisbury laboratories. The club which is in a very prosperous condition, is the only one of its kind in the city. A few days ago, the club sent a panel of photos to Springfield in competition with others from all over the state.

This afternoon, the Institute foot ball eleven plays the Brown Varsity at 3.30 on the Lake View Grounds. Next week a game is expected with the Brown Freshmen.

Mt. Holyoke.

Not a prettier nor a more thoroughly enjoyable entertainment has ever been given at the college than the cowbel party which the Freshmen gave to the Seniors Tuesday evening. Each gallant little Freshman escorted her chosen Senior through the maze of strings to be received by Mrs. Mead, assisted by Misses Waldron and Bartholomew. After a brief reception the fun began. In and out and round about with desperate determination to untangle their own strings went faculty and Seniors. Here a "grave old Senior" crawled under a labyrinth of strings, then three or four teachers held a meeting on the floor around some table legs, here a small maid mourned her lack of length by which to untwist her string from behind some picture or off of some chandelier. Laughing groups every where told as to the merriment on foot. As some of the shorter and less intricate strings were unraveled from the webs, which at first covered the whole hall, and the dainty prizes were discovered, more and more resolution was seen in the faces of those still unwinding. When all had gained their little silken spiders, refreshments were served. During the evening music was given and added much to the enjoyment. The party was a complete success and the class of '95 may well feel proud of itself.

Nov. 7 will be a holiday to celebrate the founding of the college Nov. 8, 1837.

The Teacher.

The greatest factor in the moral life and culture of the school, whatever books are conned there, will always be the high-minded teacher. Keep the high-minded teacher in the school, inspire the teacher with a proper sense of his vocation, the moral education will radiate from that teacher, whether the subject before the class be the Ten Commandments or the rule of three. Let this also be never forgotten; that far more moralizing than any particular study of morals in the schools is the very life and regimen of the school itself. This, if the life and regimen be worthy at all, is what day in and day out, year in and year out is training the child to habits of punctuality, obedience, order, neatness, attention, industry, truthfulness, respect for others, and appreciation of merit as to amount of definiteness of obedience, attention, and the rest, or of study of such definitions, could ever do. And this, we take it, is what is desired, when we talk of moral education in the schools—such education as shall make obedient, industrious, and truthful boys and girls, rather than boys and girls who can tell us cleverly and accurately what truth is, and what industry is, and what obedience is.

If there be any place where education should be concrete, it is in what concerns the moral education of boys and girls. What is wanted here is inspiration, something that shall kindle the sense of duty, something that shall give aim and impulse to the larger and better life, something that shall give the public and generous spirit, instead of the selfish and private spirit.—September New England Magazine.

At Last.

Kindergartens are to have a hearing. At the Tuesday evening meeting of the school committee the following gentlemen were appointed as stated.

On motion of Dr. Balcom, a committee of five was appointed to investigate the feasibility of introducing the Kindergarten system into the public schools. The committee consists of Messrs. Balcom, Fallon, Garver, Fitzpatrick and Ware.

Smith.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 30, a fine concert was given in Assembly Hall, under the auspices of the Analysis class. Miss Burnham of Boston was the soloist, and part of the symphony orchestra gave instrumental selections.

Hallowe'en was celebrated in some way by all the college girls. Most of the campus houses had fancy dress parties, and every one had a gay time.

Monday evening the second of the informal receptions to the faculty and students was held, and the occasion was as much enjoyed as before.

With the cold weather, the gymnasium classes have begun, under the direction of Miss Watson, and the new gymnasium, hitherto used only for play, is now to prove its use in work.

Holy Cross.

Richard H. Mooney, secretary, is sending notices to those interested that the annual dinner of the Alumni Association of the College of the Holy Cross will be held in Boston, Thursday evening, Jan. 14, 1892.

Football has come to stay at the college.

Since the foundation of the college, football has never been considered. The base ball team has always ranked among the highest and strongest of college teams but if the present prospects can be considered a favorable standard for a beginning, Holy Cross will in a few years become as formidable an opponent in this game as she has been in base ball. The first game was played with the Techs last Saturday and resulted in a tie 10-10. It was close and exciting throughout, Holy Cross being counted against the more experienced opponents. Should the two teams meet again, there is sure to be a closely contested game, as more science and strategy will have been then acquired. The team plays with Dean Academy this afternoon.

The monthly elocution exercises will be held on Saturday morning, the 7th.

The marks were read in Fenwick Hall last Thursday morning. Among the Worcester boys who attained 95 per cent or over are noticed in the Junior class T. B. Cunningham, and J. F. Spellman and in the Sophomore class T. H. Dowd, F. M. Phelan, J. T. Delehanty, J. F. O'Brien, T. F. Cummings.

Oct. 26.—The first of the readings in the "Monroe Fund Course" was given by Mrs. Irving Winslow.

Oct. 28.—We are always ready to welcome Dr. Lyman Abbott, and he was attentively listened to by a crowded chapel on Wednesday evening.

Saturday, Oct. 31—Hallowe'en celebration were held in all the college buildings. At the main building it took the form of a masquerade dinner, and at most of the cottages, parties were given.

Sunday, Nov. 1.—President DeWitt Hyde, of Bowdoin preached.

Monday, Nov. 2.—The second concert of the season was an especially good one by Prof. Baermann.

Rice, C. Henry Hutchins, E. B. Crane, Caleb Colvin, E. T. Marble, Henry E. Smith, William H. Burns, Josiah H. Clarke, Arthur M. Stone, Philip W. Moen, Jasper T. Darling, William J. Hogg, William Hart and James Logan; committee on membership, Charles G. Reed, Fred E. Reed, Roger F. Upham, Fred W. Wellington and H. Y. Simpson. Hon. Joseph H. Walker had already been elected President.

Grant and McClellan.

One morning, in the Summer of 1862, there was a procession in the streets of Washington. It passed along Fifteenth Street in front of the Treasury, down the avenue, turned to the right, and, moving over the long bridge across the Potomac, disappeared among the hills of Virginia. It was led by four bay horses; they were fine animals, matched and spirited. Their harnesses and trappings were new and glossy, but plain, and furnished with dark trimmings. They were driven by a colored man in blue livery. On the seat with him was another man of color, wearing a similar livery. The horses were harnessed to a four-wheeled vehicle called a box wagon; i. e., a wagon the body of which was an oblong box about six feet wide and high, and eight or nine feet in length. The running gear and box were painted a dark brown color, and varnished so that they shone in the rays of the morning sun. Twenty-four other wagons followed, each a duplicate of the first. Each had its colored driver and attendant in uniform, and each was drawn by four matched and spirited bay horses. On the side of each box, in large gold letters, was the inscription in three lines:

"BAGGAGE,
HEADQUARTERS
ARMY OF THE POTOMAC."

These one hundred matched horses, fifty attendants, and twenty-five wagons constituted the train provided to transport the baggage of General George B. McClellan, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Potomac, and his staff. It was said at the time that this army was perfect in its organization. This train for the use at headquarters was the only part of it I personally saw. If the army was as well provided for as its general, this statement was incontrovertible.

I remember another morning in Washington. It was in the early days of Spring, and I was living at Willard's. The outlook was discouraging and occurrences in the Treasury had been very depressing to friends of the Union. I had risen early and had left my room before dawn, and, seated by a window which overlooked the avenue, in the main office, I began to read the morning paper. The passengers from the Western trains had not yet arrived. The gaslights were turned down, and that potentate, the hotel clerk, who had not yet put in his daily air of omnipotence, was peacefully sleeping in his arm chair. Two omnibuses were driven to the entrance on Fourteenth Street, with the railroad passengers from the West. The crowd made the usual rush for the register; the clerk condescended to open his eyes and assign them rooms on the upper floor (there was no elevator) as though he felt an acute pleasure in compelling them to make the ascent, and for a few moments there was bustle and confusion. It was soon over; the clerk resumed his arm chair, closed his eyes, and his weary soul appeared to be at rest.

There were two passengers who did not appear to be in such frantic haste. One was a sunburned man of middle age who wore an army hat and a linen duster, below which, where a small section of his trousers were visible, I caught a glimpse of the narrow stripe of the army uniform. He held the younger traveller, a lad of ten years, by the hand, and carried a small leather bag.

As they modestly approached the counter, the temporary lord of that part of creation, without deigning to rise from his chair, gave the register a practised whirl, so that the open page was presented to the elder traveller, observing as he did so, "I suppose you will want a room together."

He named a room with a high number, gave the usual call "Front" while the guest proceeded to write his name without making any observation. The clerk removed the pen from behind his ear, gave another twirl to the register, and was about to enter the number of the room when he was suddenly transfixed as with a bolt of lightning. His imperial majesty became a servile menial, thoroughly awake, and ready to grovel before the stranger. He bowed, scraped, twisted, wriggled. "He begged a thousand pardons; the traveller's arrival had been expected, parlor A, on the shady side of the house, the very best apartment in the hotel, had been prepared for his reception, it was on the first floor, only one flight of stairs! Might he be allowed to relieve him of his travelling convenience?" and the lordly creature disappeared up the stairway, like Judas, carrying the bag.

My curiosity was excited to ascertain who it was that had wrought such a sudden transformation. I walked to the counter, and there read the last entry on the register. It was "U. S. Grant and son, Galena, Ill."

It was the name of the general of the Western Army, who, after the capture of Vicksburg and the other mighty victories in the division of the Mississippi, had been called to the capital, to receive his commission of lieutenant general, and to become commander-in-chief of all the armies of the republic. He was on his first visit to Washington, for what purpose I did not then know; but I have ever since been glad that I witnessed the simple and unostentatious manner in which the commander of two hundred thousand men indicated his arrival at the capital.—L. E. Chittenden in Recollections of President Lincoln.

As illustrating the meekness, not to say timidity, of that great barrister, Rufus Choate some one tells the Boston Courier this story about him: Riding in a stage-coach in Vermont, one day in company with the late Joseph Bell, Mr. Choate remarked: "What a fine wall surrounds that house." In the same vehicle sat a burly Englishman, somewhat the worse for liquor, and offensively pugnacious. "That is not a wall, sir, it is a fence," said he addressing the speaker. Mr. Choate modestly replied: "I call it a wall—a stone wall." "I say, sir, it is a fence, and I insist upon it." This was said in such a belligerent tone, that, for the sake of peace, Mr. Choate was proceeding to admit that it was a fence, when Mr. Bell jumped up and thus addressed the Englishman: "I say, sir, that it is a stone wall, and if you again call it a fence, I will throw you out of this coach." As Mr. Bell was a man of commanding size and mien, his threat proved effective, and the argument ceased right there.

"Give me neither poverty nor riches."

Happy Harvest-Time.

The golden harvest moon looks down from out the azure sky.

Upon the purple undulating hills that 'neath it lie. Its radiant light is shed abroad on forest, field and fen. And floats with pale translucent ray around the homes of men.

The shadows of the stately trees in darkened outline spread

Across the lonely mountain road, while branches overhead

Are rustling in the evening wind and lifting through the light,

That falls like gems upon the path so glittering and bright.

The farmer sits beside his hearth, his heart with pleasure glows,

His crops are safely harvested before the winter's snows. From out the window of the barn there gleams a ruddy light.

The young folks there in merry mood are husking corn tonight.

And while the ghostly shadows dance upon each dingy rafter,

They make the frosty night resound with merry song and laughter.

Come, let us steal a glimpse at them, 'tis surely not unfair,

'Twill do us good to look upon the bright young faces there.

With glowing cheeks and smiling face, fair Rachel, deft and quick,

Is striving bravely to outdo the handsome sunburned Dick.

Now swifter, swifter fly the hands, the stiot almost completed,

'Twould seem that each is sure to win and neither be defeated.

But look! Dick now sits bolt upright, while all his comrades cheer,

He waves in his uplifted hand a goodly crimson ear. He then starts up to claim the forfeit due to deeds like this.

Which is to give the nearest girl his very loudest kiss.

But Rachel like a frightened fawn has darted from her place;

Her eyes flash like two living coals, and blushes dye her face,

And turning to the eager youth now starting in the chair,

And stumbling over corn and chairs with very little grace,

She says with ringing voice and clear, in saucy piquant way,

"You'll not kiss me tonight, Sir Dick, without you'll get your pay."

Then what an eager race they ran; when, just before the door,

Poor Dick slipped up and down he went upon the dusty floor.

And from his pockets, as he fell in attitude forlorn,

There came a sight that roused a shout, 'twas crimson ears of corn.

They rolled about him every way, proclaiming his defeat,

And all pronounced the wretched Dick a very wicked cheat.

They then inflict some penalty upon the scheming youth,

In hopes to give him clearer views of honor and of truth.

But very soon the lively Dick, his penance duly done,

Is up to all his jokes again and bubbling 'er with fun. And all their spirits seem to rise as moments baste by,

And ever and again the sound of laughter rises high.

The moral of this little scene is very plain to see,

Never take red ears of corn when going to husking-bee;

But if you will do wrong, my friend, you need not have a care.

But that your sin, what'er it be, will surely find you out.

And we must turn our eyes away from this most pleasing sight.

And leave them to their merry games and innocent delight.

And as we turn away at last and cross the moonlit lawn,

A ringing, joyous harvest hymn upon the air's borne,

And far adown the shady path where countless shadows throng,

We hear sweet voices ringing clear in that glad harvest song.

Oh happy, happy harvest-time! when trees in gold are dressed.

When barns are full and hearts are glad and all the earth is blest.

—Mary Willard Gleason White.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, will issue shortly a beginner's book in Old English (Anglo-Saxon), by George Hempf, Professor of English in the University of Michigan. It will consist of elementary Grammar and easy texts suitable as introductory to advanced grammar and reading, though sufficient for the usual course in O. E. English in colleges that give but one course, and in High Schools.

Mrs. Frances E. Lanigan, the wife of Geo. T. Lanigan, the brilliant newspaper writer, will hereafter be Mr. Bok's chief associate in the editorial management of The Ladies' Home Journal. Mrs. Lanigan has been for years successfully connected with newspaper work, and she is said to be one of the cleverest women journalists in the country.

The New York Sun and Herald with the Boston Herald are all proclaiming in immense head lines that Howells's new story cost $20,000 and each one tries to convey the impression that that particular paper is the sole proprietor. Why not tell the truth and state that the story was sold to a syndicate and that any paper, choosing to do so, can print it if it will pay the bill, only a fraction of that great "Ten Thousand."

lation in 1891, An American Achievement in Art.

OPEN LETTERS.

California's Interest in Yosemite Reform, George C. Mackenzie; A Roman Catholic's View of "Sister Dolores" L. H.; The Paris Opera, A. Vianori; George H. Boughton, M. G. Van Rensselaer.

Every reader will find something to please in this number. Many will turn first to Rudyard Kipling's new novel of America and India, "The Naulahka." The art-lover will find "Michelangelo Buonarroti" very much to his liking and, perhaps, "A German Artist, Adolf Menzel" will please him as well. Brander Matthews in "The Players" gives a delightful picture of a New York Club House. "How Old Folks won the Oaks" is a genuine southern sketch such as only the Century gives its readers. The blood fairly leaps at the description of the race course. "Bill" Nye's reminiscences are in a very funny vein. Possibly, of all the later humorists, Nye comes nearest Artemus Ward. The traveller will delight most in "A rival of the Yosemite" by John Muir. Maps, descriptions and pictures well sustain the claim that this valley is a fitting companion, if not rival to the world renowned Yosemite. James Russell Lowell is recalled in two articles. Prof. Atwater's "The Food Supply of the Future" is in keeping with the articles furnished from time to time to the Century, by this Connecticut teacher. He claims that the apprehensions of Malthus need not trouble mankind. California again comes to the front in "San Francisco Vigilance Committees," a lurid picture of the troublous days in that sand bill city, all the way from the beginning to 1877.

Snow Bound, a Winter Idyl by John Greenleaf Wittier with designs by E. H. Garrett, Boston and New York, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1882.

Keat's words, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever," will be recalled by the reader who takes this dainty volume in his hands. The old story has been put in the most lovely attire and thereby it will gladden many a heart. The words, we know. Since 1862, nearly thirty years, they have been the refrain by many a resolute while the storm has raged without. Now, printed only on one side of the page, on the finest of material with ten choice photogravures the book will be read as though it were absolutely new. And to think that we can read it with its loved author yet with us! A prefatory note answers questions that every reader is prone to ask as to the parties referred to in the poem, and a few notes are added to still further illuminate the text. With all their beautiful books, the publishers, have done nothing prettier in many a day. For sale by the Denholm & McKay Company, Boston Store, $1.50.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. of Boston and New York send out attractive lists of books for Fall and Winter trade. Their Portrait Catalogue is well worth the ten cents which will secure it for any one sending that sum. It includes the most distinguished literary people in the world.

The New England Magazine for November leads off with a delightful sketch by Frank B. Sanborn, on "The Home and Haunts of Lowell." The illustrations are numerous and many of them are quite new. We are introduced to members of the Lowell family, both of past and succeeding generations. Harvard College and memories are drawn upon to help out this subject, so interesting to the English speaking world. "The Future Agriculture," by C. S. Plumb, is a kind of "Looking Backward" picture of what farming is to be. This field is ever open to the imaginative and ingenious person. "The Westminster Massacre," by J. M. French, M. D., recounts the sad event of March 13, 1775, an outbreak of the Revolution which preceded Concord and Lexington. "The Start from Delft-haven," by Rev. Daniel Von Pelt, is filled with pictures of that Holland home where our Pilgrim ancestors lingered before their final departure for America. "The Great Dike," by S. R. Duncan, D. D., is an excellent disquisition on home. "John Howard Payne's Southern Sweetheart" by Laura Speer is the most complete account of the life of the author of "Home Sweet Home" that has yet appeared in any publication. The pictures are numerous. Albert Bushnell Hart shows "Why the South was Defeated in the Civil War." People have not yet grown weary of war talks or writings. "The New South—Atlanta" by George Leonard Cheney, by word and illustration, sets forth the marvelous attainments of the South since the days of '61 and '65. "Lowell and the Birds" by Leander S. Keyser is a fitting ending of this New England publication.

The Pansy for 1891. Edited by "Pansy." Cloth, $1.75; boards, $1.25. Boston, D. Lothrop Company.

The monthly visits of Pansy to thousands and tens of thousands of homes do not in the least detract from the freshness and welcome of the bound volume of the magazine that comes to quite as large an audience at the close of the year. The constitutions of the monthly instalments and of the completed volume are quite distinct and, combined and secure for Mrs. Alden's bright and helpful magazine a phenomenal sale. The volume for 1891 is in keeping with the excellent record that Pansy has secured in previous years. A large amount of editorial and special work for the volume has of course been done by Mrs. Alden, who under her pen name of "Pansy" has for so long a time brought help and strength in purpose and in deed to thousands of young people all over the land. Among other familiar names in this year's volume are Dr. Felix L. Oswald, Faye Huntington, Mrs. C. M. Livingston, Myra Spafford, Margaret Sidney and others who by name or initials are known to thousands of readers.

Good Housekeeping, from Clark W. Bryan & Co., Springfield, Mass.

The cover has a harvest scene and from beginning to end the magazine is full of things concerning the great festival of this month. The first page has a poem on the pumpkin and next is a Thanksgiving dinner with the directions in full. The story is a Thanksgiving one and is about a boy and a turkey, neither one of which could we do without at this time. A page on various ways of cooking turkey and an article on peaches. A little history of the day is read with pleasure further on, and the recipes for using apples we know are good. Nor is that all, for there are pages on flowers, and babies, poems, and puzzles, for those so inclined. The story of a fair carries its own lesson which we hope all will heed. We turn to the prospectus for the coming year and find a book, fully as good as this year's promised, though we hardly see how it is possible to improve on it. The price will be just the same, and we hope more will take the magazine, for its good qualities are so many. $2.40 brings it every month.

The Ladies Home Journal from Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia, Penn.

A beautiful cover with a Puritan maiden attracts the attention and leads one to think of the first Thanksgiving held. The editor apologizes for the absence of the expected story but as he has given a good one in its place we will not complain. Of the wife of Max O'Rell a sketch and portrait are given, and on the same page is the first of a series of the clever daughters of famous men. Miss Sherman's picture is shown. A page in Mrs. Beecher's reminiscences tells of their early married life. There is a page for the little ones, and one particularly for the boys. Several are given up to fancy work for the coming Christmas and many new ideas for parties and other entertainments that will be especially welcome to those who wish to entertain this winter. There are so many things in the number and all so good that we advise all to purchase and read for themselves. No one can be disappointed in it, for the price is but ten cents per number and all agree that double that in value can be had from its pages. We think no other magazine offers so much.

Table Talk, from Table Talk Publishing Company, Philadelphia, Penn.

As with all the household magazines this number is distinctively a Thanksgiving number. To open the month there is a fine Thanksgiving dinner prepared by Mrs. Rorer whose fame as a teacher of cookery is wide. Two pages of Spanish recipes and the menus for November. These menus are given for every month and for every day in the month and must be a great help to the housekeeper who cannot think of anything new for dinner or supper as the case may be. The heading of the question page is unique, being a huge interrogation point. The answers are all by Mrs. Rorer and sure to be clear and so helpful to those asking. Price of the magazine only $1. So cheap, that all might purchase.

The Educational Review for November is strong in every department. President Hyde of Bowdoin points out in a striking way what is to be the policy of the small college, now that our great universities have been developed. Dr. Wm. H. Maxwell has a scholarly paper on the Literature of Education, that is full of information and suggestion as to the teacher's reading. Miss Annie Tolman Smith describes in detail the provisions made in Europe for the pensioning of superannuated teachers, and suggests the inauguration of a similar policy here. Prof. Wm. B. Smith, of the University of Missouri, in a novel article entitled Twelve versus Ten, argues for the overthrow of the decimal system of numeration.

The discussions on City School Supervision and Practice Teaching are continued by Superintendent Greenwood of Kansas City and Chancellor W. H. Payne of Nashville, Tenn. There are also articles on Women as Teachers, Recent Changes in the Regent's Examinations in New York, The New School Law for St. Paul, Minn., the Socratic Method of Teaching, and the Educated Proletariat of Germany.

The book reviews are by Prof. Woodrow Wilson of Princeton, Prof. A. B. Hart of Harvard, Prof. F. H. Giddings of Bryn Mawr, President C. F. Thwing of Western Reserve University, Prof. Henry C. Johnson of Philadelphia, and the editors. The editorial discussions are full and timely.

President F. A. Walker's standard works on "Money" and on "Wages" are attracting much attention in England, whither several editions have been sent and where reference to them in the University Extension circulars is more frequent than to any other books upon the subjects. The demand for the popular edition in this country and in England will shortly be met by Henry Holt & Co. who will issue the two works at a materially lower price than heretofore.

Betty Alden, the First Born Daughter of the Pilgrims, by Jane G. Austin, Boston and New York, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1891.

The writer has, already, acquired a wide reputation by books of semi-historic character, such as "Standish of Standish," "Nantucket Scraps" etc. As a people, we are getting far enough away from the trials and privations of the Pilgrim period to permit them to receive a gloss of romance from the pen of the novelist. Taking as her theme, the eldest daughter of the union of John Alden and Priscilla, she invests her and her times with a living spirit. Could we be carried back to those days of hard work and hard fare we should doubtless find the reality far different from what our novelist depicts; but regardless of this, we give ourselves to fancy and forgetfulness of the present, glad to be thus transported to a time, more than two hundred years away. Mrs. Elizabeth Pabodie, for such she becomes, is not the only character in the book, but her name is an excellent one to give to the story. The Alden descendants, the country over, are legion and should each one prove a reader, the Publishers will have made an excellent investment in their New England book.

There is much in rendering a book attractive, even before it is opened and here is an example. Bound in canvass, looking not unlike the homespun which Betty and her sisters spun, the top of the cover bears the impression of the Standish monument, the crowning glory of Duxbury, "The Captain's Hill" it is called. Among many volumes, this would be singled out as worth reading. When the covers are opened and we are introduced to the worthy people of the early Colonial days, we find our interest continuing unabated. To many a reader the historical novel is the most entertaining form in which literature may be had. Betty Alden is a fitting companion to Standish of Standish. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co., $1.25.

Huckleberries, by Rose Terry Cooke from Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, Mass.

This is a little volume of short stories, all from New England and offering, in their dialect and quaint phrases, a study of life that no other part of the world gives. New Englanders have always been noted for their grit and a specimen of it is well set forth in the first tale which bears the title "Mary Ann's Mind." It is a delightful story and makes one wish he knew whether she kept up her coquetry through the after years, or whether Jake always had to help her in making up her mind. There are two Thanksgiving stories both in the queer dialect. Some of the tales are sad but most of them have a joyful ending, and the sad ones have a vein of sweetness that underlies everything and so gives satisfaction for the tears we must shed as we read. We wonder if there are many like "Odd Miss Todd" and marvel at the author's ability to portray a character like her making so much out of the homely life and surroundings. "Hopson's Choice" has dainty, bewitching Prudy as a centerpiece and in fact the other characters are only as the white ware to enhance the beauty of beautiful china. "Clary's Trial" a sorrowful story with a bright ending. "Home Again" is a story of wealth that did not satisfy. "How Celia Changed her Mind," tells of an old maid who would give anything to change her position but after having tried marriage she was so glad to be free that she gave a dinner to all the old maids in town warning them all against ever entering married life. The last tale in the book is "The Town and the Country house" and gives the opinions of a dweller in each place after visiting the other. These stories have all been published in magazines and have probably been read many times but a good thing is always new and no doubt many will be glad to see this volume in such convenient form for reading. Price $1.25. For sale by the Denholm, McKay Company, Boston Store.

The Chautauquan, Meadville, Pa.

This is the American year of the C. L. S. C. and many of the articles in the Chautauquan will be on American history. "The Woman's Council Table" is a department that is heartily endorsed by all. This magazine gives its readers a kind of literature peculiar to itself, and serves well its purpose as the organ of the Chautauqua movement. It deals also with events of current interest and is well worth the price $2 a year.

A Modern Elijah.

He was small and black—a child of an inferior race. There was nothing in his appearance to suggest the hero, and if you had told him that he was a hero he would scarcely have known what you meant. An unschooled, illiterate, ugly, bullet-headed negro, he had nevertheless been baptized by the same spirit which had caused the face of St. Stephen to shine as the face of an angel.

One Winter day—almost a year before the event which gave him a chance to show the stuff that was in him—he came into the hotel looking for a job. The office was brilliantly lighted and filled with a crowd of handsomely dressed men. There were politicians, club men, men about town, reporters, many members of the sporting fraternity, the usual loungers and hangers-on, an occasional hayseed—all forming a very startling background for the rags and the filth of the poor, shivering, half starved little darkey. It was no easy matter for him to steer his course to the desk, and when he got there the splendor of the man behind it dazed him so that his voice almost failed him. He had, however, even at his early age reached the point where he had to work or starve. So his necessities made him eloquent. His eloquence prevailed. He was on the next day placed on the pay-roll of the great hotel.

As a bell boy he was not a success. I fear I must confess that he was lazy. People liked him—I do not know why—and for some reason or other he was a favorite with his employers. If he had not been there would have dismissed him before his first week was out. Instead of doing that, they concluded to find more congenial work for him, so they put him in charge of one of the elevators.

Among the passengers who used to ride up and down with the boy was a little five-year-old girl, the daughter of a family living in the hotel. She was a perfect type of her race as he was of his. With her fair, white skin, golden hair, deep blue eyes and pretty womanways, the child was a general favorite. Everyone knew her; everyone loved her.

Between her and the boy a great friendship had sprung up. He was devoted itself, and his attention to the little Caucasian was so grotesquely chivalrous as to be almost pathetic. She accepted them all with a dignity and grace that was charming. Her family lived on the top floor of the house, and she always rode in his elevator when she could manage to do so. The boy and girl saw much of each other. Once she was ill. The medicine that helped her most was a wretched little bouquet sent by her dusky friend.

It was Winter again. The evening of which I write was very cold and clear. The stars were diamond-like in their brilliancy. Everything was frozen up—the wheels creaked on the snow.

The hotel was crowded with guests. Not more than two or three of the hundreds of rooms were unoccupied. A belated traveler, who had been on a weather-bound train, came in at 1 o'clock, tired and cold. He ordered a fire in his room and then went to the bar for a drink. A few minutes later he stepped into the boy's elevator and was carried to the top floor.

Suddenly, without a note of warning, the cry of "Fire!" rang through the house.

There was life enough now. Scantly clad people were scurrying wildly through the smoke-filled corridors. They came plunging down the stairs to the office, and so out into the freezing night. Shrieks and curses and groans and prayers—it was Babel broken loose. All the bells in the house were ringing. The smoke grew denser. It seemed to come from everywhere—above and below. Great black volumes rolled through the long halls. Outside, the streets were jammed with people.

The engines, with their clanging gongs, hurried to the scene. Ladders were raised and the work of rescue began.

It was time, for there was a white figure at almost every one of the multitudinous windows. The awful wall loomed up in the darkness, story on story, dimly seen as to its upper half, for that part of it was wreathed in the blinding smoke. The smoke turned flame—flame bursting through scores of windows. The terror-stricken creatures began to jump. The people in the street below were frantic.

"Back! back!" they shrieked. "Wait! we'll save you don't jump!"

Which is the pleasanter, to be roasted alive or to be mashed out of shape on the stone pavement? If there is to be any saving done, it must be done quickly. Many people were busy saving themselves. The sleeping clerk and porter and bell boys had gotten out.

But what of the little black fellow in the elevator? He, too, had been asleep. He had been awakened as the others had been by the first cry of fire. Unlike them he had that "two-o'clock-in-the-morning courage" which Napoleon said was the rarest sort. In an instant he decided that it was his duty to stick to his post. And stick he did.

Up and down he went, and every time his car touched the office floor it was loaded with people. The journey was a frightful one, but he did not shrink. How long he could continue to make the trip he could not tell. The elevator might drop any minute. Very well, let it drop. Some of the people in it might survive the shock. It was sure to catch fire sooner or later. Even then he would be on the way to safety with his passengers. And at any rate he knew that he could bring some people out of the fire burning above.

He had not been good at going upstairs, but he could run his elevator. Trip after trip he made, each worse than the last. The fireman at the bottom of the shaft to whom he turned over his living freight sought to stop him in his dangerous work. The whole well was full of smoke, and far up toward the roof the fire could be seen.

Still he kept on, and it did seem that every time he started skyward he was going to certain death. But he knew that the rooms and halls swarmed with people, and he would take any chance to save a life. The firemen were doing their best outside; death was busy within; and he finally made up his mind that it was no use to go back again, till all at once he remembered that he had seen nothing of his little friend.

Could he weather the storm and flame once more? He could try. He pulled the rope and the journey began. It was slow, oh, how slow. The smoke was terrible—worse even than the fire—but he held his breath and fixed his mind upon the business in hand.

The flame kindled the woodwork of the car. He fell on his hands and knees, but he kept his hold on the rope. At last he reached her floor. He found her room, and found her. She was asleep and alone.

Wrapping her in the blankets, and throwing about her a rug which he snatched from the floor, he struggled through the flame and smoke back to the flaming car. "Back from the jaws of hell" it was that he brought her, fighting the fire away from her every inch of the way down. He had just strength enough to stop the car.

The children were taken out and carried to a drug store across the street—the girl alive and well and the boy seemingly dead.

He was horribly burned. Among the people who stood around were the parents of the little girl. They had been out to an evening party, and returning after a long cold drive found their home on fire. Every effort had been made, in response to the agonizing appeals of the father, to save the child—and now here she was, safe and sound, laughing in her mother's arms.

And the hero? He opened his eyes.

"Did I bring her froo all right?"

"Yes, yes," said the father, "and how can we ever thank you for what you have done?"

"Neber min' 'bout dat, boss. Ef she's safe dat's 'nuff for me"—and he closed his eyes.

Dead? Yes, dead and gone to heaven in a chariot of fire.—Spectator.

RICHARD YORK.

That Nose.

He very well knew when his nose came in contact with the barrel that there was trouble ahead. At lightning speed a long array of explanations suggested themselves. Darkness, extra energy applied to the coal shovel and a barrel, out of place, caused it all. The mark was a bad one. Court plaster only emphasized it. Not to mention the wound's prominence to the owner of the nose, for it seemed to stand out like a mountain, here are some of the remarks he was called to face.

"Ha, ha! Did you get that clip in your scrap with —?"

"How's the other fellow's nose? Any worse than yours?"

"That's what comes from getting into politics."

"Got your nose into it, didn't you?"

"Rather bad for a peaceful man."

The only points of sameness in the long gauntlet was the thought that the injured nose had been in some sort of a row. The infinite versatility of mankind was never better brought out than in the remarks that the plastered nose induced. Had there been a blackened eye along with the scabbed nasal organ; explanations had been valueless and they didn't amount to much as it was.

"One touch of Nature makes the whole world kin." Diseases common to the race compel the search for a common remedy. It is found in Ayer's Sarsaparilla, the reputation of which is world-wide, having largely superseded every other blood medicine in use.

Our Common.

Whatever the city may do in the way of parks in the future, the time can never come when the Common will be of less interest and importance than it is today. A heritage from the very earliest days of Worcester, it should be preserved as the fathers left it. Boston has withstood every encroachment on her cherished Common, worth more to Boston than any Middlesex Fells or Water Parks can possibly be. The camel got his head into New York's tent when the City Hall was located in Park Place. The Croton fountain soon had to come down for the U. S. Post Office and, today, there is only a set of paths across what should have been an open space forever. The Battery, small and encroached upon as it is, is, nevertheless, in proportion to its size, of more utility than the more remote Central Park. Acre for acre, there is no part of the city of New York so gladdening to the eye as the Battery. It is sought after and fought for by railway lines but it is still intact. Long may it continue so. Here in Worcester, our Park Place and our Battery are in the very heart of the city. Green grass and umbrageous trees invite to rest and contemplation. But some over sensitive folks complain that dirty, unkempt people use the seats and that they some times lie on the grass. In the present condition of our laws and customs, even these people must live and they are certainly better sitting in this large, open place than loitering along our streets. At one time, the seats were taken away, but it was deemed best to restore them. More seats, rather than less should be there. The common, in New England, takes the place of the old world market spot. Our ancestors, whatever their greed for land, always were willing that a certain part should be set aside for public purposes. Their wisdom is very evident today. A New England village, gathered about its central green, is a picture to carry in fancy wherever we may go. If the town, in assuming its city form, still maintains its Common what a glory the latter becomes. Lynn's Common is famous the country over. Norwich delights in that choice spot given to monuments and recreation, and he would be a rash man who should venture to suggest the appropriation of any part of New Haven's Green for any purpose other than that already subserved. Even the old State House, a relic of loog ago, has disappeared, only the churches and the ancient burial ground remaining.

But in this Heart of the Commonwealth there are not wanting those who see in this Common of ours a desirable site for a new City Hall. Grant that the new city building should come at once, and many will not concede as much, why seek to cover with any kind of an edifice the land that is fragrant with recollections for nearly two hundred years. Just where the building should be is an open question, with a strong leaning towards the North End, on Lincoln Square, but that it should not cover any portion of the Common, thousands of Worcester people will claim with great emphasis. Our city has not yet risen to a true appreciation of memorials. On the Common now, we have the Soldiers monument and that commemorating Colonel Timothy Bigelow, but there are other men and events in our history that should be set forth here in enduring form. More than a hundred thousand dollars were paid out to free the Common from the Old South Church. Popular feeling closed it to Post Office profers and if City Hall projects can be averted the spot is preserved forever.

What might and ought we to have on the Common, when our present City Hall is torn away? When the Old South was young, July 14, 1776, Isaiah Thomas intercepted the special messenger from Philadelphia to Boston, and taking the copy of the Declaration of Independence from his keeping read it for the first time in New England from the roof of the western entrance to the Old South Church. Worcester has never appreciated her opportunity nor her privilege. Would not a granite structure, recalling the form of the old porch, surmounted by a bronze of the Revolutionary printer, editor and patriarch be a lesson to posterity equal to that given by any memorial in America, this structure to stand just where the old porch was. Again, what name was more generally known, not only in America but wherever English is spoken than that of the Apostle of Temperance, John B. Gough? To all intents, Worcester was his home. His name and fame were and are linked with ours. His body rests in our midst. When the temperance world, as it surely will, arouses itself to a sense of what it should do, and means are raised for the most magnificent fountain in America, where should that fountain be but on this Common? The Probasco Fountain of Cincinnati has long been the glory of that city, though it is situated in the midst of a small plaza, dripping muddy Ohio water. What would not a Gough Fountain in Worcester be, surmounted by a bronze of the great orator in the attitude of delivering his Apotrophe to Water? Such a consummation is not an improbability and monuments add to the interest of a locality while they do not cumbar. Magnificent edifices look out upon Trafalgar Square in London, but they do not encroach. Regents Park is surrounded by palaces, but Albert Memorial is as near a building as any thing of man's making within it.

Most unreasonable of all are those who say, "Put the new City Hall in the middle of the Common." They forget that a considerable portion of the reservation was once a cemetery. The Bigelow monument is near the North-West corner. To locate a building there, means not only a disturbing of the dead, but an upheaval of the marble memorial, with its associations with both the Revolution and the Rebellion. For the Colonel of the old Massachusetts Fifteenth was thus remembered and the stone dedicated on the 10th of April, 1861, when other Massachusetts soldiers were laying down their lives in Baltimore. (Quite fifty years have elapsed since those lofty trees were planted over the leveled graves, and, in all this period, they have waved not less proudly that our ancestors lumber beneath them. To be sure there is no curse stored up like that above Shakespeare's grave, against those who disturb these bones, but history, tradition, love of family and friends, everything save greedy, remorseless, soulless trade call for their undisturbed repose.

May fate grant that, for ages to come, child hood may sport here, weary age find rest and comfort beneath these trees and may the monumental structures, reared here, quicken and fix the love of country and city, and may the City Hall and every other edifice, proposed for any part of our Common find lodgement elsewhere. A glorious heritage, let us keep it intact.

"History, Geography and the Earth."

[Extract from a composition of a little African girl in the Orphanage at Cape Palmas, Liberia.]

Do you know what history is? History, as you know, teaches us what is to happen in the past event. Geography shows us where the thing has happened at. History tells us where Adam and Eve were created, and geography shows us where the garden of Eden is, which continent, which division. History tells us that Adam was the first man who was created, and while he was sleeping, God took out one of his ribs, and made Eve. After a while, Eve went to walk among the trees of the garden. Conversation took place between her and the devil. The devil took her to eat some kind of fruit which God had told her and Adam not to eat. She took it and ate it, and also took some for her husband. When Adam saw it, he did not take no time to ask Eve where she got it from.

History, geography and the earth just do go together; one tells us about this, and one tells us about that, and so forth. Histories are interesting to read, indeed they are. It tell us about the whale. The whale is the largest animal in the sea. Whale is spoken of in the Bible. When God sent Jonah to Nineveh to preach to the people about their sins, Jonah refused to go. He went into a ship with some people. He just went there to hide from God; but God caused a storm to take place. The ship went from this way to that way. The people was afraid indeed, and they began to cast lots. The lot fell upon Jonah. They took him up and threwed him into the sea. While he was going to the very bottom of the sea, he met with this animal. So, the whale said, "My friend where are you going to?" Jonah answered, and said, "I have disobeyed God, and am trying to hide from His face." The whale said, "You ought to be ashamed of yourself, don't you know that neither you nor I cannot hide from His face?" Jonah said, "O whale, I am so afraid, I don't know what I am doing or saying." The whale said, "Jonah, oh! Jonah, hearken unto me, and take heed unto yourself, for I will follow you up soon." "Have mercy upon me, O whale, and if it is God's will, He will carry me safe to the land, so I may obey Him." The whale said, "Jonah, put your head in my mouth, and get ready for your life." Jonah said, "Whale, I think you better swallow me, because I see there is no use in talking." The whale said, "Jonah, the idea of your running away from God! You will bear the consequence; that is all I got to say." At the same time he did swallow him up. Jonah thought the whale's body was his grave and end. Therefore he offers up a prayer for his sins, if he should die before he should get to the shore, if it was God's will to carry his soul to heaven. The whale did not rest day after day, nor night after night; so after three days, the whale went to the shore, and vomited up Jonah. Jonah was just like a drowned rat.

Curious Corner.

One Way to Spell Potato.

Considering the state of the crops and the anxiety expressed by our English cousins about our spelling, the following exercise may be appropriate. Who invented it is unknown to me, but it sounds like Dr. Wayland, of Philadelphia, a "fonetik parson:" "What does this spell—Ghoughphtheighteau?" Well, according to the following rule, it spells potato; Gh stands for p, as in the last letters of hiccough; ough for o, as in dough; pht for t, as in phthisis; eigh stands for a, as in neighbor; te stands for t, as in gazette, and an eau stands for o, as in beau. Thus you have p-o-t-a-t-o.—Boston Advertiser.

Derivation of Several Words.

Canter is an abbreviated form of Canterbury gallop, so called because pilgrims to Canterbury rode at the pace of a moderate gallop. A grocer, so says the dictionary, was originally one who sold by the gross. A "grenade" derives its name from its shape, which resembles a pomegranate. A "bisquit" means "twice bakad," because according to military practice, the bread or biscuits of the Romans were twice prepared in the ovens. Did you ever notice the leaves of the dandelion? They are said to resemble, in form and size, the lion's tooth and the French call it the dent de lion and "the dandelion."

The pope was formerly called "the pape," which means the same as "papa," or father. Vinegar came from two Latin words vin acer, meaning "vine" and "sour." These are only a few of the many curious and interesting things I found in my afternoon's search in the old dictionary. When you are at loss for something to do follow my example, and you will be surprised at the many bits of information you can pick up in a little time.—Omaha World-Herald.

Human Discontent.

A rich man of Boston has one son. He led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye. The son became of age this summer. The father has no other occupation save that of nursing his income, and as he is a man of sense and liberal views he told his son that he must not stand idle, yet let to him the choice of business or profession. At the same time he wrote privately to twenty-four friends and acquaintances, asking their advice in the matter. The twenty-four were prominent, each in his own calling. And each replied in turn, complaining of his own business, and advising the father to seek elsewhere, for the future prosperity of the young man. The law was crowded, journalism brought but little money, banking was an uncertain prop, and so on throughout the catalogue. The father is still undecided, the boy is idle, all because no one of the twenty-four is contented with his lot, while he admires the fortunes of other men.—Boston Post.

Webster's Dictionary.

The legal profession of the present day will be surprised to learn that Mr. Webster, the greatest American lawyer of his time, made but $15,000 a year by his practice. But the fees of counsel between 1840 and 1850 were not what they have been since.

In 1848 I accompanied a client to Mr. Webster's office in Boston and asked him to name a retaining fee in an important patent case. He said that he thought a couple of hundred dollars would do. When the case was tried his fee was only a $1,000. On another occasion I paid him a retaining fee of $2,000 for the proprietor of the Goodyear india rubber patent.

His fee for arguing the great equity case of Goodyear versus Day in the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, by which he established the validity of the Goodyear, was $5,000. This was in the Spring of 1852, and was the last case he ever argued.

His professional income from 1818 to 1823, during which period he was out of congress, averaged, I think $20,000 a year.—Cor. New York Sun.

Well Seasoned.

George Wilson is hauling pine timber that has from the best information, been under water and in the ground 70 years. It was unearthed in digging for a new building for Barber & Co. Milton Spafford is taking it to his saw mill and will probably get 1,500 feet of pine plank out of it. Where the six timbers were found was once a small mill and it is thought it was built and in operation as early or earlier than 1812, one of the first saw mills in this vicinity. Quartus Rust remembers it in 1827 and it was then going to decay. These timbers found in the mud and water were in more sense than one "old settlers."—Fulton, New York, Patriot and Gazette.

Blackmer—Kerr.

The Congregational Church was the scene of a very pretty morning wedding at 11.30 today.

At that hour a large number of the friends of the contracting parties gathered to witness the marriage of Miss Helen, daughter of Prof. and Mrs. James H. Kerr, to Mr. Henry Myron Blackmer, the attorney of this city.

The chancel of the church was beautifully decked with palms and chrysanthemums. Mr. Will Blackmer, brother of the groom and Messrs. Douglass, Townsend and Pettinoff acted as ushers. Miss Prentiss performed at the organ. During the gathering of the congregation the Swedish and Norwegian wedding marches were played as was the Bride's Song and the Vorspiel to King Manfred, by Reinecke.

Promptly at 11.30 the bride and groom entered and advanced to the chancel, preceded by the ushers, while the organ pealed forth Wagner's glad wedding march, from Lohengrin. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Jas. B. Gregg, and was both beautiful and impressive. An Intermezzo was played during the ceremony and the bridal couple departed from the church during the playing of Mendelssohn's wedding march.

Mr. and Mrs. Blackmer left at once on the noon train for a short wedding trip, and their cards announce that they will be "at home" Mondays, November 16th, 23rd and 30th, at 631 North Cascade.—Republic and Telegraph of Colorado Springs, Col., Oct. 28, 1891.

Massachusetts Politics.

BY SYLVIA A. MOSS.

Massachusetts is a grand old state
With farms and cities fine.
No fatter forests grow than hers,
Of chestnut, oak and pine.
No lovelier vales than hers are found,
No brooks and springs more clear—
Is there a state in forty-four
Te home hearts hail so dear?
No! No! we bless our happy fate,
We love her, one and all,
And yet we know her one of eight
That favor Alcohol.
You will hear it on the common,
You hear it on the street,
You are liable to hear it
Of any one you meet.
She repeats a famous saying,
It may deceive you some.
"Massachusetts goes Republican
In everything but rum."

She builds her big asylums though,
Has lots of courts and jails,
But in the liquor traffic vote
Deplorably she falls.
There is so much wealth invested
And such big rents come in,
'Tis lucky that the rum-seller
Can shoulder packs of sin.
She keeps her poor-farms booming great;
And her out-door relief.
None of her private charities
Have ever come to grief.
There's ever a host of applicants,
Of criminals there's a throng,
Somebody's boys, somebody's girls,
Must help such work along,
'As Ephesians' idols found of old Deceiving were to some:
"Massachusetts goes Republican
In everything but rum."

* There are but eight states out of forty-four that refuse to have the effects of Alcohol on the human system taught from text books in the public schools. Massachusetts is one of the eight.

ABOUT FOLKS.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard W. Greene are expected to sail from Haven for home today.

E. L. Sumner will again train the Amherst Glee Club.

Rufus S. Woodward has had a ten days' trip to Maine. Business and pleasure.

Miss L. F. Roy, a former High School girl, has returned to Houghton Seminary, Clinton, New York, for a second year there. This school, under the care of Principal Benedict, has a well earned reputation for care and worth.

The consciousness of having a remedy at hand for croup, pneumonia, sore throat, and sudden colds, is very consoling to a parent. With a bottle of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in the house, one feels, in such cases, a sense of security nothing else can give.

Invitations have been issued by Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Murray for the marriage of their daughter, Miss M. S. Murray, to Mr. M. T. O'Connor. The interested parties are prominent in Catholic society circles.

Like a good patriotic citizen, Charles E. Hildreth came home to vote. There are other voters in Amherst who should have done likewise. They should have done their part towards making an Amherst man governor.

Christmas Work.

Head-rests, tied against chair-backs, are decidedly inviting and cozy-appearing. The newest design is a pansy, quite as large as a dessert-plate. You buy the cut out pattern, already to be worked and shaded, and this done you set it in a nest of puffed silk, spread it over a down-cushion and tie it with ribbon bows across the back of your favorite library chair. You can also buy and similarly treat large yellow water lilies, sunflowers and full-blown poppies.—Tabla Talk.

A Photograph Panel.

The photograph panel is something very novel in the way of a case for photographs. A piece of ribbon three inches wide and about thirty inches long, is threaded through three heavy cards eight inches square, in the way shown in the illustration. The top card has two slits at top and three at the bottom, the middle card has three at both top and bottom, and the third has three at top and two at the bottom, the cuts being wide for the ribbon to pass smoothly through. In the center of each card is cut a place for the photograph, $3\frac{1}{2} \times 5\frac{1}{2}$ inches, the picture being supported by the ribbon which passes back of it. A large bow of the ribbon is sewed at the top, and behind it is fastened a small ring by which to hang the panel. The lower end of the ribbon may be turned into a point ornamented by three coins or balls.—Ingalls Magazine.

A Dainty Glove Mender.

A lady never goes with unattended gloves, and a dainty woman likes to have the little belongings that tend to make her gloves fresh and new as pretty as possible; so out of her imaginative brain has sprung this arrangement of threads, needles, scissors, and mender all prettily grouped and ready to be fastened on the dainty silk apron, in the pockets of which are the gloves that are to receive attention. An ivory ring has tied on it a pretty bow of bright yellow ribbon, one end sloped off to a point, the other cut into a vandyke. In the pointed end are stuck a row of very fine needles, the size that will not break the kid, and yet have sufficiently large eyes to carry the thread. The threads—the regular ones used for sewing gloves—may be gotten at most of the large glove shops, and are in the various shades of tan, gray, pearl and black. They are drawn over the rim, are loosely braided to keep them straight, and then are allowed to fall in a fluffy string. The little ivory ball, small enough to slip up the finger of the glove, has a hole through the point, and through this is drawn a narrow, yellow ribbon, which is then tied in a bow and looped over the ring. At the other side a yellow ribbon holds the scissors in place, and when the industrious woman sits down to mend her gloves nothing is lacking; there is the needle, thread for it, the tiny mending egg that exposes the rip or tear, and the scissors that carefully clip the thread when the work is all over. If it were preferred, blue, pink, green, or, indeed, any color liked, might be used for such a chatelaine; but the yellow, especially when a bright color is chosen, is to be preferred to all others.

Pompton Puffs.

BY MARION HARLAND.

3 cups of flour, 1 tablespoonful of butter, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoonful of salt, 2 cups of milk, 4 eggs whites and yolks beaten separately, 1 heaping teaspoonful of Cleveland's baking powder.

Sift flour, baking powder and salt together twice, chop in the butter. Stir the beaten yolks into the milk and add the flour, then the frothed whites. Whip high and light and bake in cups in a quick oven.

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Hot biscuit made with Cleveland's baking powder may be enjoyed even by those of weak digestion. Cleveland's is the anti-dyspeptic leavening agent. The leaven comes from cream of tartar and soda, nothing else; no ammonia or alum.

Good to Eat.

When hunger calls, obey; not often wait
Till hunger sharpen to corrosive pain;
For the keen appetite will feast beyond
What nature will can bear; and one extreme
Ne'er without danger meets its own reward.

Oatmeal Breakfast Cake.

This is made of Number Two oatmeal, with water enough to saturate the meal, and little or no salt. Pour the meal into baking tins, or into dishes half or three-quarters of an inch deep, cover all the pans to a depth of about an eighth of an inch and shake down level; and then pour in water until it is so wet that the water runs freely on the surface. Place in a quick oven and bake twenty-five minutes. Eat warm with good New Orleans molasses, honey or fruit sauce. This is a delicious dish for children.

Date Cake.

A pound of dates, stoned, a cupful and a half of sugar, two-thirds of a cupful of butter, two-thirds of a cupful of milk, three eggs, half teaspoonful of soda, a teaspoonful of cream of tartar.

Bohemian Cream.

For a Bohemian cream, which one may enjoy at any time of year, add a pint of water and a third of a box of gelatine (dissolved by bringing to a boil after soaking for an hour or two) to a pint of peach marmalade. Put the whole through a sieve, and stir in a bowl set in ice until it begins to thicken, then stir in gently a scant pint of firm, whipped cream, pour the mixture into a mold, or a glass dish in which it is to be served, and set on the ice.

Beef Balls.

Any piece of raw, lean beef will do, but round-steak is the best. Scrape with a sharp knife the way of the grain; the meat comes off very easily, leaving behind all the tough, sinewy part. Season with a little salt, and form into small balls. Place a bit of butter in a hot pan, and cook quickly, turning the ball from side to side. These are very delicate and nutritious, and can be borne by the most delicate stomach.

Rice Pudding.

One quart of milk, four tablespoonfuls of rice; boil together till the rice is soft, then add a scant cupful of sugar, three spoonfuls of butter, a teaspoonful of salt, and a teaspoonful of vanilla extract; stir in the well beaten yolks of four eggs as soon as the mixture is cool enough not to scald or cook the eggs as they are put in, thereby causing lumps. Bake the pudding.

Bishop Phillips Brooks will be present at the January meeting of the Episcopal Club.

Some years ago, the old Marquise du P— had informed her servants that she expected a call from the Archbishop of T—, but failed to add that he had been married in his youth, and that he had only resigned his commission as captain of cuirassiers and entered the church on the death of his wife. The latter had left him with two little boys. These, now grown up and themselves officers in the army, accompanied their father on the occasion of his call. A gray-haired groom of the chambers, on asking the right reverend gentleman whom he was to have the honor of announcing, started as if he had been shot upon receiving the reply: "The Archbishop of T— and his two sons." "Jamais!" exclaimed the worthy domestic, in tones of horror, choking with indignation. "Never shall I be guilty of such disrespect to Mme. la Marquise," and with that he fled, leaving the prelate and his two sons to make their way into the salons unannounced. It was only subsequently that she was able to explain to the old servant that the archbishops' two boys had been born in lawful wedlock previous to his entering holy orders, and the fact of his being accompanied by two stalwart sons should not be considered as evidence that he had violated his priestly oath of celibacy.

CLOAK DEPT.

The cloak room has been an unusually active place the past week. One reason for it is that our styles are exclusive, and in point of excellence not to be compared with the ordinary makes of Cloaks, of which so many are shown in this city.

Another point. They cost but little more to begin with, and their wearing qualities are so much greater that they are really cheaper in the end.

And another point is that we strive to get numerous choice styles, rather than a big lot of one thing. Look at our Cloaks, and see if we cannot please you.

Caught in the Snow.

We are red apples, quite healthy and jolly.
Though not much given to chattering folly;
Just old reliable,—this must be pardoned—
Living through summer with staid hearts and hardened;
But in late autumn our bosoms grow mellow,
And each of us then is a sound, social fellow.

But, ha, ha, ha! We always rely on't,
That man marks the weather and keeps a sharp eye on't,
And sees that we're carefully handled and gathered—
And snug in the cellar in dry barrels thereof,
Ere out of the heavens the snow comes a-flying,
The trunks and the branches in white sashes tying.

And, ha, ha, ha! Man was caught blindly napping!
The big snow walked in without any rapping;
And now from a mantle of white we are peeping,
And watching the garden blooms icily sleeping.
'Neath the same coverlet, while the wind, blowing
Flakes in our faces cold, shows it still snowing.

Entertainments.

The second entertainment of the Young Men's Christian Association Course was given Thursday evening by the "Dudley Buck Quartet" with Mrs. Lucia Mead Fried, reader. The quartet sang four selections, three of which were by Dudley Buck. "Hark, the Trumpet calleth," "Concert Waltz" and "Annie Laurie" arranged by him. The finale was the "Calvary Song" by Brewer. Mrs. Priest captured her audience by her first reading and was heartily encored. She also read "A Ride of Three," a story of the plains, and "Two Views of Human Nature." H. E. Distelhurst sang "Fond Heart" by Hope Temple, and Messrs. Phillips and Swalm rendered Graben-Hofman's duet "I Feel thy Angel Spirit." Frederick Reddal sang the ballad "My Queen" by Blumenthal. The quartets were given without accompaniment, the solos and duet were accompanied by George N. Morse.

Mechanic's Course

Don't forget the Tuft's College Glee and Banjo Club concert next Monday evening.

Salvation Army.

"All things are lawful but all things are not expedient." It is proper for the Army to parade but it should look out for the crossings. The crowd, looking at election returns, was in no mood to turn out for any thing smaller than a horse car. Discretion is sometimes better than valor and a fair display of it Tuesday evening would have saved the Salvationists some rumpling.

George T. Pearce.

Another face to be missed; another hand cannot grasp! Our comrade, George T. Pearce died at his home, 9 Cottage Street, Monday morning, aged 54 years, 9 months. He had been ill about a month suffering from a paralytic stroke. He was a member of Post 10, G. A. R., having seen service during the war on the U. S. bark Guerilla. He leaves a wife and two children, Mrs. Henry J. Pearce of this city, and Mrs. Ethan Allen of Vergennes, Vt. He was a house painter by occupation and an industrious upright citizen. His funeral took place from his late home Thursday.

The Piedmont Branch Chapel observed its second anniversary Sunday evening.

There have been admitted to the Old South Church during this year ninety-seven new members.

BAPTIST.

Rev. Gideon Aubin, pastor of the French Baptist Church will begin next Sunday evening at his church at 7 o'clock a course of about 20 lectures with the general subject "A Defense of Christianity."

UNIVERSALIST.

Rev. Dr. Gunnison has but few idle moments in his pastorate. In addition to the care of his large parish and many calls for funeral and other services he is in constant requisition for outside service. Last year he refused upward of fifty requests for lectures and addresses, besides accepting all that his time would permit. During the present week he has preached an installation sermon at Bath, Me., in the church where he had his first pastorate, spoken at the unveiling of a memorial window to the memory of a former parishoner and delivered a lyceum lecture at Saugus. Dr. Gunnison commences next Sunday evening a course of lectures on "The Great Churches and their Leaders." His subjects are: "Paul and Christianity," "Leo the Great and the Catholic Church," "John Calvin and Calvinism," "Cramer and the English Church," "John Robinson and the Congregationalists," "Roger Williams and the Baptists," "William Penn and the Quakers," "Swedenborg and the New Church," "Wesley and the Methodists," "Channing and the Unitarians," "Murray and the Universalists." The lectures are not derogatory of the work of the churches, but sympathetic and appreciative of the good work inspired by their existence.

The Stone Club, of the All Souls Church held, Tuesday evening at the home of H. K. Sparrell, 3 Charlotte Street, the first of its series of fortnightly meetings. After a short business meeting a literary program was carried out of which "Whittier" was the general subject. Rev. F. A. Gray read an essay, "Reminiscences of Whittier;" Miss Bertha Jenkins recited "The Barefoot Boy;" Miss Sadie Sparrell read "In School Days;" Miss Florence Jenkins read "The Minister's Daughter;" Rudolph Weyer read "Barbara Frietsche;" and Miss Bertha Cady read "The Huskers." There were also a piano solo by Miss Cady and a song by Miss Sparrell.

The next meeting will be held in the lecture room of the new All Souls Church Tuesday, Nov. 17, when an entertainment entitled "The Wooden Wedding" will be given. It will be open to the public. The remainder of the series is as follows: Dec. 15, social in charge of Mrs. Cady and Miss Stratton; Jan. 5, public concert by Lilhanatus quartet, in charge of Rev. F. A. Gray; Jan. 19, whittling social in charge of Jessie Norcross, Fordis Bushnell, and Frank Sparrell; Feb. 2, public lecture by Rev. Dr. Almon Gunnison; Feb. 16, valentine party in charge of Misses Bertha Cady, Sadie Sparrell and Ernest Houghton; March 1, concert and readings in charge of M. M. Mowry and Miss Bessie Russell; March 15, social in charge of Willie Marsh, Charles Ranger and George M. Hubbard; April 5, illustrated lecture by Rev. F. A. Gray; April 19, character party under the direction of Mrs. B. A. Wheeler and Miss Josie Kerr; May 3, public May party under direction of Mrs. H. H. Dyke, George M. Coe and Miss Hattie Parks; May 17, "Our Cambridge Poets" will be talked and read about, for which Louis A. Spaulding and R. A. Wheeler will make the arrangements; June 7, lawn party in charge of Edward F. Britton and H. H. Dyke.

EPISCOPAL.

The annual reception of All Saints Church was held Monday evening in the chapel. Mrs. L. M. Lovell, Mrs. Halleck Bartlett, Mrs. Preston Payer, Miss Fanny Clark and Miss Clara Smith were the hostesses of the evening. During the evening a meeting was held for the organization of the women's work in the parish.

Anniversary Sermon.

On Sunday the 18th of October, Dr. A. Z. Conrad closed the first year of his pastorate over the Old South Church and, appropriate to the occasion, preached an anniversary sermon, taking for his text I Cor. 2:2. After referring to the motive of the apostle in his work at Corinth, Dr. Conrad spoke of his own relation to this church.

"My feeling today is one of deep thanksgiving that under the influence of the Spirit we have been united by the strong bond of Christian love, and have walked together in perfect agreement and increasing attachment during this first year of our wedded life. Our relation has been in many respects ideal. We have rejoiced together in the salvation of souls. The numbers entering our church family have been large beyond all expectation. You have wonderfully supported your pastor in his delicate and difficult tasks. Your cheering words and ready response to every call, your constancy at the services and self-sacrificing assistance all combine to give enthusiasm and courage. Our social life has been full of true Christian fellowship. Our societies have nobly lived the motto 'For Christ and the church.' What next? The year is before us, big with promise. The deep spiritual earnestness pervading the church is prophetic. My expectations are absolutely unbounded. God forbid that we should glory 'save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.'"

METHODIST.

Grace. Tomorrow morning the service will be devoted to aged people. The platform will be decorated with fruits and vegetables which will be distributed Monday to families who need them. In the evening a harvest concert will be held.

Trinity. The Senior Bible class under the able and entertaining leadership of the Rev. John D. Pickles, now comprising some fifty members meets in the church every Sunday at noon. Last Monday, Nov. 5, they sat down with their friends to a substantial supper on the occasion of the annual meeting. About one hundred were present. Supper was served under the superintendence of J. A. Clark, Geo. W. Tourtelotte, the president, Mr. W. F. Clinhard, and vice president Mr. McFarlane, and some lady friends, upon whom the heaviest duties of the preparation devolved.

After supper (which was duly appreciated and enjoyed) the following program of entertainment was carried out in a manner highly creditable to those who took part. John E. Mayhew officiated as toastmaster. Vocal Duet, "The Lord is my Shepherd," pianist, Winifred Mayhew, Misses Coddling; Toast, "The Church," may its membership increase, W. D. Barber; Reading, Tennyson's May Queen, Mrs. J. E. Mayhew; Violin Duet, "Valse" pianist, Winifred Mayhew, Flora Clark and C. E. Mayhew; Toast, "The Commonwealth," Geo. H. Tourtelotte; Male Quar-ette, Richard Walls, J. A. Clark, Arthur Walls, Theo. Barber; Toast, "Our Pastor, J. A. Clark; Duet, "Fiddle and I" pianist, Winifred Mayhew, Dora Coddling and C. E. Mayhew; Toast, "Our class and friends" H. Morrell; Vocal Solo, pianist, Dora Coddling, Miss Amy Coddling. On the whole the evening was a very enjoyable one, and would have been perfect had it not been for the unavoidable absence of Rev. John D. Pickles.

Hiram E. K. Whitney will lead the morning meeting at 9:15 tomorrow. Seth K. Mitchell will speak to the boys at 3 o'clock and to the men at 4.

The annual meeting of the board of directors was held Monday evening when officers were elected as follows: President, Charles F. Rugg; vice-presidents, Philip W. Moen, George T. Dewey; recording secretary, Geo. F. Brooks; treasurer, J. F. Keyes. D. W. Abercrombie, George L. Sanford and Chas. M. Rogers were appointed a committee to fill the vacancy on the board caused by the resignation of W. H. Bartlett, the first vice-president. The report of the treasurer showed a balance of $462.28 in the treasury. The resignation of Will D. B. Meade, who has been assistant secretary for two and one-half years, was received and after some discussion by the board it was laid on the table for two weeks. There are many who desire, if possible, to persuade Mr. Meade to remain, as he is a thoroughly efficient secretary, being excellently adapted to the Association work because of his wide knowledge of all the best methods. Mr. Meade stated in his resignation that his reason for tendering it was his dissatisfaction with the methods of General Secretary Gale. Between the two there is no personal feeling.

Should Mr. Meade's resignation be accepted, he will go to his home in Pittsfield, Thanksgiving, and will then choose between several positions which have been offered him, among which are a number from various Associations in this state. But as he has become very much attached to Worcester there is a possibility of his returning and entering business here.

The bi-monthly meeting of the Local Union was held Thursday evening at the Dewey Street Baptist Church. At eight o'clock the program began with the singing of Endeavor songs by the congregation, followed by Scripture reading by the president, D. B. Tucker, and prayer by Rev. Elihu B. Haskell of the South Baptist Church. Rev. D. H. Stoddard of the Dewey Street Church welcomed the visitors and two young lady members of the society sang a duet. Then followed the address by Rev. Phillip A. Nordell of New London, Conn., on "Interdenominational Fellowship." He advocated interdenominationalism but not undenominationalism. Following the address, the announcement of the result of the contest for the Union banner was made, the Park Church society, which has held the banner for the past month, being declared the winner, having 68 per cent of its members present. The Dewey Street society ranked second with 66 per cent, the Belmont, third with 40 per cent, the Church of Christ, fourth with 28 per cent, the Pilgrim, fifth with 27 per cent, the Lake View, sixth with 25 per cent. This is the first time that the banner has been won by any society when the meeting was not held at its own church. After singing and prayer by Rev. A. B. Chamberlain of the Church of Christ the meeting closed with the Christian Endeavor benediction. During the evening President Tucker read a notice of an amendment to be acted upon at the next meeting to the effect that the election of officers shall be held in September instead of October and that the regular bi-monthly meetings shall begin at that time. The next meeting will be held at Pilgrim Church in January. The Junior Endeavor Society started at Pilgrim Church several weeks ago has now about thirty members. Meetings are held every Friday afternoon after the close of the public schools. Miss Fletcher is the superintendent.

Household.

The bulbs of the Chinese lily will bloom from six to eight weeks after planting and with a few bulbs started at intervals of about three or four weeks apart, a succession of flowers may be had throughout the Winter. Plant in a cool, dark place and when rapid growth and bloom is wanted, remove to a warm sunny window.

The bulbs of lilies intended for winter blooming should be potted in November or December, and placed in a dark, cool closet for several weeks, when they may be watered and brought to the light. When in flower they should be placed in a dry, airy, cool situation, for the flowers are liable to spot and soon decay in a close damp atmosphere.

To Wash Table Linen

Put into a washboiler four pails of cold water. Dissolve four tablespoonfuls of washing powder and put in the tablecloth and napkins, first having placed in the bottom of the boiler an old towel, so that the quantity of water is sufficient to float the clothes, or they may be scorched in bottom. Soak over night. In the morning, place the boiler over the fire where it will take about thirty minutes to bring it to a boil. Stir several times. Now turn them into a tub of cold water and rinse well. Rinse again in clear water and then blue.

Clothes thus treated, contrary to common prejudice, will be white, clean and sweet, without any rubbing whatever.—Table Talk.

Some varieties of the fuchsia make admirable winter plants if not allowed to bloom too much during the summer. Blooming may be facilitated by the use of weak copperas water. A north window may be given up entirely to ferns and fuchsias, as the two look well together.

The dainty blue browellia makes an admirable house plant. It is so generous with bloom that it will utterly exhaust itself if allowed to do so.

A group of blooming hyacinths in winter is something to make the heart rejoice. Procure the bulbs now, plant them in a wide-mouthed pot, and set them away in a dark closet for five or six weeks to make root growth. Then expose the young shoots to heat and light, and nature will do the rest. Crocket.

If the housewife is careful to save all the bits of twine, wrapping paper, etc., she will always find them useful, and a great deal of time and petty annoyance will be saved in this way. Habits of small saving inculcate a spirit of thrift which goes far in young people toward making them useful and efficient members of society. One of the greatest follies which can be committed in this direction, however, is to concoct uses merely to use up this material. The pasty bread puddings, which no one likes, and probably no one ever did like, may be charged to such excess of ill-directed economy. Valuable eggs, milk and other materials which would make an excellent custard are wasted in the desire to "use up" the bread crumbs in this way. There are excellent bread puddings, but they are not made of undried breadcrumbs soaked in custard apparently for no other reason than to save them.—New York Tribune.

A GREAT MAGAZINE.

The Century's Programme in 1892.—A New "Life of Columbus"—Articles for Farmers, etc.

That great American periodical, The Century, is going to outdo its own unrivalled record in its programme for 1892, and as many of its new features begin with the November number, new readers should commence with that issue.

In this number are the opening chapters of "THE NAULAHKA," a novel by Rudyard Kipling, the famous author of "Plain Tales from the Hills" written in collaboration with an American writer, Wolcott Balestier. It is the story of a young man and a young woman from a "booming" Colorado town, who go to India, he in search of a wonderful jeweled necklace, called the Naulahka" (from which the story takes its name), and she as a physician to women. The novel describes their remarkable adventures at the court of an Indian maharajah. Besides this, the Century will print three other novels during the year, and a great number of short stories by the best American story-writers.

The well-known humorist Edgar W. Nye ("Bill Nye") is to write a series of amusing sketches which he calls his "autobiographies," the first one of which, "The Autobiography of a Justice of the Peace," is in November. This number also contains a valuable and suggestive article on "The Food-Supply of the Future," which every farmer should read, to be followed by a number of others of GREAT PRACTICAL VALUE TO FARMERS, treating especially of the relations of the Government to the farmer, what it is doing and what it should do. This series will include contributions from officers of the Department of Agriculture, and other well known men will discuss "The Farmer's Discontent," "Coöperation," etc., etc.

A celebrated Spanish writer is to furnish a "Life of Columbus," which will be brilliantly illustrated, and the publishers of The Century have arranged with the managers of the World's Fair to print articles on the buildings, etc.

One of the novels to appear in 1892 is

A STORY OF NEW YORK LIFE

by the author of "The Anglomaniacs," and the magazine will contain a great deal about the metropolis during the year,—among other things a series of illustrated description of "The Players' Club," founded by Edwin Booth, and one of the features of the illustrated Christmas (December) number is an article on "The Bowery."

To get The Century send the yearly subscription price ($4.00) to The Century Co., Union Square, New York, N. Y.

The Chilean Cloud.

War clouds are not inspiring to peace loving people, hence when trouble seems imminent between our country and a sister republic of South America it is fitting to ask what it is all about. The triumphant Congressional party has not loved our nation since our enforced neutrality, particularly with reference to the Itata affair. So when, on the 6th of October, certain sailors of the U. S. Cruiser, Baltimore, were ashore in Valparaiso, they were set upon by the populace, and, some claim, by the police. Several lives were lost, on our side, our sailors being unarmed and thirty-five were arrested and thrown into limbo. Naturally, our government asks for explanation and reparation. The same will come soon or there will be the worst case of Chili-Blain on record.

CROUPY SOUNDS

At night, from baby's crib, are distracting to parents who are at a loss for a medicine equal to the emergency. Not so with those who have Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in the house. A dose of this medicine affords certain and speedy relief. To cure colds, coughs, sore throat, asthma, bronchitis, hoarseness, and the various disorders of the breathing apparatus, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral has no equal. It soothes the inflamed tissue, promotes a copious expectoration, and induces repose. Capt. U. Carley, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children were subject."

"I use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my practice, and pronounce it to be unequalled as a remedy for colds and coughs."—J. G. Gordon, M. D., Carroll Co., Virginia.

DRESS OVERCOATS, GENTLEMEN,
AN IMPORTANT CONSIDERATION.

You have got your long heavy rough Overcoat, perhaps, and it is splendid for every day service.

It is not exactly as you want for dress occasions, or for Church, and maybe you are wondering just what it is best to have for these special uses.

Of course we know that you don't want to sacrifice warmth in your DRESS OVERCOAT, and this winter there is no need of your doing it.

The Cloths, this year, for these Overcoats are perfectly elegant, and very heavy.

Chief among them in the order we name arc

PATENT BEAVERS,
RICH KERSEYS,
ELEGANT MELTONS.

The "Patent Beavers" are a remarkably smooth, beautifully soft cloth, in deep black, blue and brown, with one pattern in steel mixture that is particularly good.

These "Pattern Beavers" will make the finest DRESS OVERCOATS of the year.

The "KERSEYS" are a firmer cloth to the touch. They have not the remarkable delicacy of the patent beavers, but they are splendid Cloths for the particular service you require.

MELTONS are in the same class, and it is simply a matter of taste and choice with you as to which you prefer.

Either will make you the very highest and best style of DRESS OVERCOAT possible to make. This is no idle statement for these very good reasons:

OUR CLOTH IS MADE THE BEST;

OUR STYLES ARE PERFECT;

WE FINISH WITH LAP SEAMS; AND RAW EDGES.

You know the perfect work we do. No use in naming the price. The same DRESS OVERCOAT made in Boston or New York would cost you a great many dollars more than we will ask you.

MAKE YOUR SELECTIONS SOON,

WINTER IS COMING.

Who Knows?

Who knows
(I thought, one twilight hour,
As from my window gazing
If yonder cottage light)
Throughout the night twinkling,
And yonder stars above,
Claim not close relationship
Who knows?

Who knows,
As each new star appears,
It prove not just a beacon
To guide some wan' rer home,
To show some one awaits them?
The stars above, below,
May simply need reversing.
Who knows?

—B. L. Gilbert.

If there is a moment when Worcester looks better or prettier than by day it is when the twinkling lights of even appear.

From any outlook what lines of radiant beauty meet the eyes! Then, too, to one who has noted the changes over a term of years the growth and development are marvelous. In the night, looking from Harvard street over the valley to Normal School Hill the effect is not unlike that had when gazing from Princes Street, Edinburgh, across to the old town.

There is the same busy hollow with its noise and whir, whence come the puff and whistle of locomotives, and the dull constant roar of traffic. Of course, day dissipates the impressions but with only the stars above and the lights of men below, imagination can take wings to itself and fancy the bridges, the cathedral of St. Giles and even the Castle itself.

After all, Worcester is an intensely practical city. Her mechanics and her merchants have developed sturdy, paying qualities; but there has been little fancy or poetry among them. Prose has been enough for them. Will it ever be thus? Massachusetts has led the country intellectually, but is it not a little strange that so few of the literary lights of the Commonwealth have dated from Worcester. Edward Everett Hale and T. W. Higginson have lived here, but they were not Worcester products.

The Latin School of Boston and its atmosphere, along with the proximity of Harvard had much to do with the development of Lowell, Holmes, Hawthorn, Hale, Prescott, Parkman, not to mention a multitude of lesser lights. The bent of our industrious city has been in another direction, a praiseworthy one to be sure; but may we not long for, nay expect that, some day, increased leisure and means shall add to our people literary renown.

As yet, even our Educational Institutions are of that practical character which makes little of literature, much of things. The drift, after all these years of being, is still toward the material rather than the ideal. From Art Societies and clubs, from libraries and historic association much is expected, but they have much to do. Worcester takes high position in patent cases; but in a literary sense, she is far behind Hartford, and other cities much smaller than herself.

There is need of an awakening. How can it be effected? What is done to quicken the sensibilities of our young people? We have a week of music, to which every one goes in September, but when did a winter oratorio or symphony concert pay? Let the parties of genuine culture and enthusiasm, whose hands have gone deep down into their pockets to pay the bill, answer. The way out of so much practicality, at the expense of the ideal, is to make art, of all kinds, and literature in all its phases, more and more, questions of constant importance. It should begin in the schools, and well begun there it will end only with life.

The new City Hall project seems to have met a set back in the Common Council. Our wise men cannot reflect too much on the words of the late Mayor Doyle of Providence. "Oh yes, our City Hall is much better than yours; but yours has not a debt of several millions." If we don't have it, we won't have it to pay for, and as for show, let western cities that borrow money in the East delight in that sort of thing. Few business men are captured by magnificent city halls. One of the first questions asked by a visitor would be "Is it paid for?" and if not, "What is the tax rate?"

But if it must come, there is a settled feeling in the minds of many that the Common is not the place for it. In another column, a writer expresses the sentiments of very many as to the appropriation of an inch of land for any such purpose. Let it look out upon the Common, from any one of the corners near, or let it stand on the site of the Norwich freight station or from some poorly covered land on Front Street; but keep off the Common. The future will bless us for such a course.

Was there ever such a tolerant nation as ours? Only a few years ago, Chicago, justly hung a crowd of riotous cut-throats called Anarchists, fellows who openly proclaimed that they aimed at the looting of the city and a readjustment of wealth; an abrogation of all laws. They were cut short in their schemes. Today, in Chicago thousands visit their graves with great parade and in Cooper Union, New York, Nov. 6, orators shouted themselves hoarse over their taking off. Would any other nation tolerate it?

Most prophetic of songs, John Brown's Soul marched through the Rebellion and, today there is scarcely a county on the globe where it is not heard. From far away Egypt, the land whose darkness became proverbial comes this refrain.

"Just then, one of the donkey boys struck up:

John Brown's body lies a-mold'rin' in the grave,
But his soul goes marching on!"

In this they all joined in full chorus, repeating it over and over again; and as the Glory, glory, hallelujah!"

resounded over the desert, it seemed to me that it might have been heard for miles. I never joined in singing our national hymn with such glad devotion as I joined those donkey boys in singing:

His soul goes marching on

Glory, glory, hallelujah!"

Verily, a prophet had spoken to my soul!"

If our Salvation Army and Christian Crusaders will persist in parading the weather to the contrary notwithstanding, why don't they equip themselves properly? Their religion is no better though thoroughly wet down, and though consumption and pneumonia may hasten departures to the other world they are not believed to particularly enhance piety here? An umbrella drill would be an excellent thing and would surely attract attention. Belts and braces would readily adjust the rain protector to the shoulder of the marcher and then he or she could make music ad libitum. Try it friends!

What has David Manning ever done that he should be accused of hostility to Free Masonry and Odd Fellowship? He was a secret society man in college, one of those rollicking D. K. E. boys who stirred up things generally in whatever college they found themselves. Mr. Manning is a decided man, having the courage of his convictions, keeping nothing back, who fought in the open, who inflicted no secret stabs, and who now that the battle is over can say, "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith."

The Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic deems it necessary to issue an order conveying his displeasure at the parading of old Federal soldiers under the Confederate flag. Peace and good will have gone to seed when this thing happens. There is but one flag in America, i. e. our portion of the continent, and the man who can so far forget what he imperiled his life for as to march under Rebel colors needs just such a touching up as Captain Palmer's letter. Keep the Confederate banner for Rebel celebrations and curiosity collections, but let us have none of it.

Total Abstinence Union

At the session of the Worcester Society Catholic T. A. U. in Uxbridge today, Worcester is well represented. Principal Richard H. Mooney is lecturer for the union and presents a report, while papers will be read by George Lee, Edmund Power, P. A. Dowd, Rupert H. Murray and Richard O'Flynn. LIGHT recalls the most of these names as those of former High School boys. Patrick F. Drohan of Worcester is the secretary and John E. Hanley, president.

The Idle Hour, representing Barnard Sum-of the VI volume. Here are twenty-four pages of reading matter, including advertisements which are read first by many into whose hands the paper falls, over a very wide section of this county. The Idle Hour has interested readers who purchase extensiv-ly by mail. It reflects a deal of credit upon merchants and compiler.

Charles Baker & Co. are sending out one of the neatest combinations ever devised. It comprises a fine leather covered card or ticket case with a celluloid Calendar for 1892, along with a removable memorandum of 80 pages, besides a deal of valuable information as to window sash, doors, mouldings, stairs, and balusters. There is also the latest arrangement of the fire alarm numbers. The man who carries the book has a pocket full of facts in very small compass. LIGHT, hereby, returns thanks for a copy.

The advertisement of "Schapp's Photographs is worthy of careful reading. A better book for a Christmas gift was never offered. By it geography may be taught through the eye.

It is better than a panorama or a stereoscope exhibition.

Mr. Wm. Cruikshank has again placed LIGHT under obligations, this time with a bouquet of chrysanthemums. After them comes Winter with its death and burial of the flowers. Last trace of Summer's color, the chrysanthemum reigns without a rival.

LIGHT's excellent "Tech" correspondent takes exceptions to the continued use of "Free Institute" in these columns. If it is possible to break a habit, formed long ago, strengthened by long years of use in fitting boys for that same institution, the expression shall not be found here again. Orders are out to "kill" it whenever it appears.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

The first of the course of four readings by George Riddle, under the auspices of the School of English Speech was given last week
Friday evening in the hall of the school, in the Colonial Hall building. The first half of the evening was devoted to Shakespeare's "Anthony and Cleopatra," the reader giving an admirable interpretation of the characters of the Roman and the Egyptian. Following this,
Mr. Riddle read two humorous selections,
Stockton's "A Piece of Red Calico" and Kate Douglas Wiggin's "The Rehearsal of the Ruggles Family for a Christmas Dinner" in which he was as successful as in the more sober parts in the tragedy. Last evening he read Browning's "A Blot in the 'Scutcheon.'"
The two remaining readings will take place next Tuesday and Friday evenings. Simultaneous with the Worcester series, Mr.
Riddle is giving a course of six readings in Boston. At the opening sale of season tickets, over 800 seats were sold in less than two hours. Speaking of the opening night of this course, the Boston Herald says: "It is the first course that Mr. Riddle has given in Boston for some years, and he received a most enthusiastic welcome, showing plainly that he had lost nothing of their favor since his last appearance. Always a great favorite with the best element of the Boston public, he seems to have a stronger hold upon it than ever, a hold that was not lessened by his achievement last evening."

Friday Populars.

The first of the series of entertainments of the Friday Popular course was given last week Friday evening in Mechanics Hall, by the Walter Emerson Concert Company, which includes Walter Emerson, cornetist;
Miss Mac Fowler, reader; Miss Bertha Webb, violinist; Miss Minnie Babcock, contralto;
Edwin M. Shonert, pianist. The entire program was excellent and there were frequent encores, but Walter Emerson achieved the triumph of the evening with his cornet. Miss Webb's solos were also very well played and were well received by the large audience. The next entertainment will be a lecture, November 20, by Miss Olof Krarer, a native Esquimaux, who is only forty inches high. Her subject will be Greenland.

Dix Street Bakery.

Mrs. A. S. Smedley, whose husband so long managed Fox's Pleasant Street bakery, has bought of E. H. Streeter the bakery, 25 1/2
Dix Street, and has added all conveniences for making first class pastry. Tea rolls and warm bread, a specialty at 4.30 P. M. Also frosted squares, jelly squares, angel cake, frosted cup cakes etc. Brown bread and baked beans every Sunday from 7 to 9 A. M.
This will prove a special boon to all dwellers in the vicinity.

Among those suffering from the disastrous conflagration in Orange was Col. J. A. Titus, late of this city, who had only recently opened an office in that town.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of

Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to

About Folks.

The Worcester Athletic Club will probably hold two indoor athletic meetings during the Winter though no definite arrangements have yet been made.

One of the happiest faces in this office for many a day was that of George Holmes who happened in Wednesday from Springfield. There are few people in Worcester who have frequented the Boston Store who do not remember him. Only last Spring, he went up to Springfield to have the care of Waldesruhe, a pleasure resort in the city's hill park. He has found the place agreeable and he makes Worcester a visit with his wife just to tell how nice a town Springfield is, and to see how old friends here appear.

Ex Alderman P. F. White was so unfortunate Wednesday last as to lose a valuable horse by drowning in Salisbury's pond. The animal was badly frightened and so took to the water.

Mrs. Henry A. Marsh and the Misses Marsh, assisted by Miss Lucie Williams of Boston gave a very pleasant "at home," Tuesday evening to about one hundred of their young friends, at their home, corner of Elm and Oak Streets. Tea was served from 5 to 8 o'clock and there was dancing from 8 to 11, for which Truda's orchestra furnished music. The interior was prettily decorated for the occasion with ferns and potted plants. The tea table was presided over by Mrs. Hallel Bartlett and Mrs. J. Fred Mason, assisted by Miss Miriam Washburn, Miss Carrie Tiffany, Miss Nellie Whitman, the Misses Chase, Miss Gertrude Wood, the Misses Lincoln, Miss Christine Rice, Miss Mary Doe, Miss Amy Stoddard, Miss Lucy Throop.

Woman's Relief Corps.

A delegation of twenty members of our local corps went to Holden Wednesday evening to attend a G. A. R. fair in that town.

City Water.

In the general dearth of water, the eastern country over, it is comforting to know that Worcester's supply shows no sign of failing.

Was it Appropos or Not?

In a Worcester church, recently, an eloquent visitor had presented his cause and asked for a collection. As the boxes were passing the organist struck up "God be with you till we meet again." Many wondered whether the musician feared lest the size of the offering might require more than usual oversight.

Born, Nov. 10th.

a daughter to Wm. V. H. and Mary D. Barhydt. Mrs. Barhydt was Miss Reeves, once a High School girl. Congratulations and good wishes for the trio.

Society of Antiquity.

The new building of this body approaches completion and will be opened Tuesday, Nov. 24, at 3 p.m., with addresses by Mayor Francis A. Harrington, Senator George F. Hoar, Hon. W. W. Rice, Rev. Carlton B. Staples and others. Located a few rods north of Lincoln Square, on Salisbury Street, it can be readily reached after leaving the cars there.

Adams—Hardy.

Nothing seemed lacking to an auspicious marriage when Thursday last, the Rev. Dr. Archibald McCullagh tied the hymenial knot for Harry A. Adams and Miss Minnie D. Hardy. The groom, a son of the late John Quincy Adams, is a clerk in the Central National Bank and one of the best known young athletes in the city. The bride is a High School graduate, Class of '90, and a daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Frank C. Hardy of 46 Abbott Street. Only the immediate friends were present. The bride wore a neat traveling dress of dark blue chevrot trimmed with tan broadcloth.

There were many presents. The bride received a sealskin sack, a banquet lamp, a quartered oak chamber set, a fur rug, a mantle clock, silver tea and dessert spoons, hand-painted china, cut glass ware, silver cake and fruit baskets, etchings, $20 in gold, besides many household furnishings. The groom received $50 in gold from the Worcester Athletic Club, a solid silver tea service from the Lakeside Boat Club, and a painting from the officers of the bank.

Mr. and Mrs. Adams left on an early evening train for New York and after a ten days stay in that city and Washington will reside at 46 William Street, the home of the groom. They will be "at home" Tuesday evenings during December.

John B. Gough.

Among the many places in the city where can always be pleasantly spent an odd half hour are the rooms of Mr. A. E. Peck.

Recent visitors there have been gratified with the sight of a fine life-sized portrait of the late John B. Gough.

The picture represents the eminent temperance lecturer as a much younger man than the present generation remembers him, having been, as the inscription on the frame informs us, presented to Mrs. Gough by the Scotch Temperance League of Glasgow upon May 22, 1855.

But the features, nevertheless, bear a very familiar look, and the position of the figure—strikingly dramatic in pose—brings before one most vividly the earnest apostle of temperance when Mechanics' Hall rang with his eloquence and its immense audiences were alternately swayed to tears or to laughter by the magic of that tongue now forever silent.

One could not help wishing that the portrait might eventually be found upon the walls of that Hall—a fitting memorial there of so earnest a worker in so noble a cause.

At Auction.

Horace Kendall's auction rooms, Thursday, were crowded with people desiring souvenirs of the late John B. Gough. The books and engravings went very cheap, but the tea-set, presented to him by Scottish admirers, sold single pieces, brought a large price. It is a pity that such a collection should be scattered. Worcester will, some day, regret this. She is not rich enough to retain every item.

The reception given by Col. N. A. Plympton to his son Herbert F. Plympton was attended by the following Worcester people: Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Knowlton and family, C. H. Pinkham and wife, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Murdoch, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Hopkins, Miss Lucy Newton, Miss Duncan, Mr. George W. Eddy, Mr. William Parker and Mr. Edward F. Smith.

Mr. F. J. Houston of the Boston Store has entered the race for councilman from Ward 4. Frank has many friends and should receive a hearty support.

Mrs. Walter E. Bowen, the popular teacher in the Front Street School of Elcution went to Colbrook last Thursday to give readings in that place.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Myrtle Ferns," a comedy-drama of intense interest, abounding in situations exceedingly humorous and pathetic, has proven a great attraction at Lothrop's Opera House during the week. Miss Ethel Tucker, as Emma Myrtle, an American girl, tried and true, has renewed her triumphs. She is an artist in the true sense of the word. Mr. H. Percy Meldon, as Henry O'Grady made his appearance on Monday and Wednesday evenings, and received an enthusiastic welcome. Mr. J. Francis Kirke assumed the character during the rest of the week.

The popular comedy-drama in four acts, entitled, "Our Angel" is laid in the mountainous country of the far West and admits of picturesque stage dressing and effects which have been especially prepared for the play. The plot is intricate, with a relieving element, introducing comedy of an entertaining character. Miss Rober, as Blossom, a character made famous by Lizzie Evans, will be seen at her best, as her talents are most admirably adapted to the requirements of the part. Max Erceman, as Jack Kenyan, a rough man, but with a heart as true as steel, will be welcomed by his many admirers. Each performance will be preceded by the farce, "An Hour in the Hospital" in which the comedy company will make fun in their usual brilliant style.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY.

William Adams Munn.

It may well be a matter of pride to the people of Worcester that this is the only city in the world that has an Annual Music Festival of the magnitude of that held every Fall by the Worcester County Musical Association. This shows the high taste of the people, and here in this musical city are very appropriately placed several manufactories of instruments, both organs and pianos. One of the largest of these is the Loring & Blake Organ Co., at the head of which, as treasurer and manager, is the subject of this sketch.

William Adams Munn is the son of George M. Munn and Sarah A. Leslie, and was born in the city of Lowell, November 18th, 1864. His early school days were spent in Holyoke, where after a course of four years in the Holyoke High School, he was graduated in 1881, and at once took a position as book-keeper with the firm of D. H. and J. C. Newkirk, otherwise known as the Massachusetts Screw Company. Here he remained for three years, then taking a place with the firm of Parker, Holmes & Co. of Boston, boot and shoe jobbers. It was from them that he came to Worcester in April, 1886, to become the book-keeper and pay-master of the Loring & Blake Organ Co. He has been connected with this company to the present, having been elected in January, 1890, treasurer and manager for the company.

He was married Sept. 4, 1889, in Waltham, to Miss Edith Marsh of that city.

At first sight one is impressed with the business qualities of Mr. Munn. He is modest and retiring but a pleasant talker, and ready for business at every time.

Regarding the company with which he is connected, a few words may be of interest. It was founded by John W. Loring and Rufus W. Blake, who began to make organs in October, 1867. At this time they occupied French's Building on Southbridge Street, from which they removed the next year to a building between the Norwich and Boston & Albany Railroads. Soon after this, November 14, 1863, they formed a corporation under the name of the Loring & Blake Organ Co. Only a few months later, the building and its contents were totally destroyed, and the company took up quarters on the site of the new Post Office, at Franklin Square, the place formerly occupied by the Taylor & Farley Organ Co. But this place was not large enough to accommodate all the works, so rooms were occupied in Stone's Block, Steven's Block, French's Building, besides having a mill on Cypress Street. These places were held till July, 1877, when all the scattered parts of the business were collected at the premises on Union Street that they now occupy. Once more, Feb. 2, 1882, fire consumed part of the building, involving a loss of over $41,000. But this time only the two upper stories were destroyed, and soon repairs were made, and the company was in running order again. Mr. Blake of the original firm, is now at the head of the Sterling Organ Company at Derby, Conn., and Mr. Loring is still superintendent of this factory. On going through the building, and watching the process of manufacture, one is struck with the care that is taken at every operation, and as a result only organs of the highest grade are turned out. There is no need to make a cheaper class of instruments, for they are working on orders all the time, and do not have to make ahead of the demand. The annual output is about three thousand organs.

These organs find a ready sale in all parts of the world. They are handled by dealers in the United States and a house in London has charge of all the business of England and the Continent; but the company ship direct to Africa and Australia. The volume of the foreign business is almost as great as the domestic. A room is soon to be opened at the factory on Union Street for showing instruments. This will be a new thing, but will make it very convenient for those who are interested in organs and want to try their qualities.

Many improvements have been brought out by this company, among which is the improved tone effects that have been introduced in their "Palace" organs. This company has received many gold and silver medals from fairs, where their organs have been on exhibition, thus testifying to their worth.

CITY HALL AND THE COMMON.

IN LIGHT of Oct. 31, H. K. M. gives his views in regard to the location of the new City Hall on purchased land. Undoubtedly many are with him and like myself send congratulations that he is able to prepare for publication so lengthy and interesting an article on the subject.

Why should the city spoil her fair name by listening to any arguments in favor of the scheme to place the new building on the Common? Truly it is time for us who are proud of the beautiful area to protest against the desecration; to speak in behalf of the trees which have so often invited us to their cool shade in Summer's heat. Ingrates, if we remain silent when their destruction seems imminent.

Boston, in her young days, gave to her citizens a grand old common. Did Boston of a few years since place her City Hall thereon? The ground was hallowed ground and she not even suggested such a thing.

Worcester with her Antiquarian Hall and Society of Antiquity should be less reverent? Worcester, intelligent Worcester, can she so ignore her early gift as to take one foot of it away from her sons and daughters?

Let her give—freely give them the Common—the whole Common and not only will posterity bless her, but visitors will give her unbounded praise for her thoughtfulness in reserving for all a breathing place so spacious and beautiful, withal, in the crowded portion of the future Heart of the Commonwealth.

A monument indeed; could she rear for herself a grander one?

CONSTANTIA.

Councilman Irving E. Comins has been quite ill, but is now improving.

On the 8th of next January a Prize Contest in Expression is to take place before the Philomathean Society of Boston University. Among the contestants are Misses Eleanor and Mabel Thomas, '93, daughters of Rev. W. H. Thomas, late pastor of Trinity Church.

'61.

Out from the east the day-break creeps,
With sparkles of light as it drifts along
Flushing the crests of mountain peaks,
Waking the crystallized chorings of song;
While down in the woodlands, tender and dim
It gathers in peace like a morning hymn.

Out from the river's beaded brim,
The watering fords of vairy mist
Quiver and rise in pearly film
On tintings of opal and amethyst.
While a vision of Peace on Nature's breast
Broods low, like a birdling above its nest.

Adown dim, meadow paths of grass,
The loitering herds are driven along,
Till one by one the bars are passed;
But never a sprinkle of morning song.
Her smile can awaken the eager face
Of the boy, as he slides the bars in place.

The wild birds trill their morning call,
From the daintiest shrub, and fern and tree,
Antiphonal welcomes rise and fall
In the merriest waves of choral glee;
While over them all, from the woodland's hush,
Comes the voiceful prayer of the hermit thrush.

He heeds them not; 'tis his boyish pace
Goes hurrying hown its moistening way,
Through drifts of grain, whose waving grace
In the morning's freshening breezes sway;
Out into the dust of the village street,
He is speeding along with nervous feet.

Listen? What mars this peaceful scene?
What measuring tone and rhythmic beat
Breaks like the air so still, serene
With ominous tread of marching feet?
"Attention! Fall in!" and the boyish face
Glides silently into its given place.

"Forward! Guide right!" The last word said,
The pitiful partings and pledges true;
"March!" Faint and fainter grows the tread
Of that soldierly band of Boys in Blue,
As Peace in her same old nestles down
On the slumbersome air of the quiet town.

'81.

Out from the East the day-break creeps
With sparkles of light and ripples of sound;
Crowning the crests of mountain peaks,
While down in the valleys, in sleep profound,
It glitters in pennons of golden light
And scatters the mists of the murky night.

The river gleams. The morning sun
Sends shimmering waves o'er the dewy grass,
While a bright herd, linge'ring on by one,
At last the same old paths have passed.
But where is the form with its manlier face
To fasten the moss-laden bars in place?

Over on yonder grassy slope,
—In a quaint niche,—by the river's brim,—
He sleeps,—nor wild bird's sweetest note
Can awaken the sleeper pale and grim;
While o' the coat of blue on the cottage wall
Tells of the sacrifice, and,—that is all!

And—that is all? Aye, is it all?
When deeds are written in heroic story,
What nobler light shall there recall
The blood of manhood, roused to martial glory,
Than those brave boys, unhoosered and unknown,
Who gave their lives for liberty's white throne?
Frank O. Everett.

Boston, October, '91.

The wife of Mr. E. I. Comins, late principal of the Woodland Street School, resident on Leicester Street, was seriously injured, Sunday, in trying to alight from an electric car. Her dress catching, she was thrown down resulting in the breaking of both bones of the right leg below the knee. Dr. J. B. Rich treated the case and did all that could be done. Mrs. Comins will have the sympathy of a wide circle of friends.

Boston University.

The Odean Concert Company of Boston University gave a very successful concert last Friday evening in the Jacob Sleeper Hall.

Pres. William F. Warren has gone to Cleveland, Ohio, to attend the conference of Presidents and Principals of Methodist institutions relative to forming a federation.

Miss Annie Hayden Webster delivered her second lecture on "Psychology and Physiology of Voice Production" Thursday afternoon in the college chapel. Her lectures have been quite largely attended and all seemed to enjoy them.

Numbers 2 and 3 of the University Beacon went out Saturday.

Prof. D. Dorchester, Jr., delivered a stereopticon lecture on art Tuesday afternoon. It was given especially for the class in Aesthetics but nearly all the students were present. The subject of the lecture was the "Development of the Ideal in Art."

The Boston University Glee Club have reorganized. They are said to be superior to all previous musical organizations in the college. They have dates at Newton, Amesbury, Newburyport, Roxbury, Ayer, Gardner, Merrimac, Portsmouth, Brockton and in the Jacob Sleeper Hall.

The Massachusetts Teachers' Association will meet at Jacob Sleeper Hall Friday and Saturday, Nov. 27-8.

Boston, Nov. 11.

Harvard.

The sensation of the week has been the removal of the ban placed by the Faculty upon Corbett, Mackie, and Waters, and the restoration of those players to the football eleven. All students in the University have been anxiously awaiting this action, and the fact that every one of the men on probation has been restored has sent Harvard stock booming. There was no denying the feeling of almost despair which before existed over the outlook. Now all are hopeful, not to say confident, that the crimson's success of last year will be repeated on Saturday, November 21, at Hampden Park.

Thus far in the season, Harvard has won 436 points to her opponents' 10, having played eleven games. In nine games Yale has scored 384 points and lost none. The fact that Harvard has allowed her opponents to score exposes her weakness in defensive play, but the addition of Mackie and Waters will remedy that evil. The presence of the two great half-backs, Lake and Corbett is Harvard's strength. Captain Trafford is a beautiful kicker, and has the confidence of the college in his way of handling the eleven. Yale will not have the walkover which has been so confidently predicted by the Boston papers.

H. C. Lakin '94, W. H. S. '90, won the half-mile run in the Varsity handicap races last week. His start was 15 yards.

A Harvard Republican Club has been formed with one hundred and fifty members. Several Worcester students are included.

Physical Training.

Now that our authorities are awake on this subject it will be well for them to pretty thoroughly consider all systems before they commit themselves to any one. Is it not possible to combine the advantages of several systems? Dr. J. Gardner Smith in a communication to the Board of Education of New York City, referring to various systems says: "The purely German system is too slow and not sufficiently recreative for the great mass of children, while the purely Swedish system requires too close attention on the part of the children demanding nearly the same nervous energy that is already being expended in study. The American system, as conducted in our colleges and academies is largely individual work which with the limited time, limited amount of apparatus and large number of children in our schools is impracticable. The system in our schools should be a rational system, founded on the principles of anatomy, physiology; comprising at the same time, education, recreation, discipline and other elements which tend to develop an all round man or woman. * * * * * The system of physical training in our public schools should not add mental strain but afford mental relaxation."

According to reports of the recent exhibitions in Continental Hall, some of the teachers found the exemplification of the Swedish system anything but restful. A very successful teacher of physical culture says, "While I lived in Boston I talked with many children who had no enthusiasm for the Swedish gymnastics and I was told that in Brooklyn, N. Y. the Swedish classes in the gymnasium were extremely small. * * * I hope the Worcester schools may not be confined to the Swedish system which is but a fraction of a physical training." It would be well for those having the matter in hand to hasten slowly. A reading of "The Gymnasium" edited by Ellen LaGarde, 29 Weybosset Street, Providence, R. I., would be a valuable lesson. Any training that does not carry with it diversion and mild emulation will not be gratefully received by the children. After all, there will be as much or more in the teacher than in any particular system.

High School.

This week brings the first term of the school year to a close and now after ten weeks of hard work, we are waiting for the time when our reports shall be distributed. Some perhaps "with fear and trembling," while the majority will be proud of their marks. The class motto of '91 would be well worth remembering.

Mr. Perry's astronomy classes have been improving the mild and pleasant weather by taking observations of the heavens, the principal stars and constellations being pointed out and also the moon, Jupiter and the Pleiades viewed through the telescope.

Monday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, the Glee Club held its regular meeting in the hall. Previous to the rehearsal, Mrs. Merriam sang a solo for which the club extended a vote of thanks.

Summer Club. Readings, G. A. Collie, H. A. Street; paper, G. R. Bliss; reading, A. F. Parrott; question—"Resolved that United States should take measures to increase her territory;" affirmative, J. W. Higgins, A. R. Taft, H. H. Hill; negative, E. W. Goodell, D. G. Burrage, H. A. Street; decided in the affirmative.

Assembly. The assembly felt highly complimented last Friday night, being favored with the presence of about twenty members of the Altheia accompanied by Miss C. P. Townsend. Declamation, E. W. Cutting; extemporé address, G. Ellinwood.

Eucleia. Declamations, W. E. Foran, J. McKenna, T. McGarroll; reading, J. Garvey; question—"Resolved that the United States was justified in taking action against Chili," affirmative, J. Curran, J. Murphy; negative, T. McDermott, F. Desmond; Mr. C. E. Dowd was elected president for the ensuing term.

Worcester Abroad.

Whenever a Worcester boy or girl climbs up the ladder of success, the city is glad to know it. Miss Nellie A. Murray was one of the bright girls, sent out from the High School in 1876. Then her name appeared in 1879 on the Normal School list of graduates. For twelve years, she was one of the most successful teachers in Worcester, latterly, being at Chandler Street along with Principal Bartlett. A few years ago, she began a course in physical training, finally graduating from a complete Normal System in Boston. While retaining her place in our city schools, she conducted classes in her own and other schools, among others a large and successful one in the High School. She was, also, the conductor of physical training in the Y. W. C. A. During the past Summer, she was at Chautauqua, doing very efficient work in that world famed resort. So excellent was her teaching, she received many offers of places, but finally accepted a very lucrative situation in Memphis, Tennessee. There in Clara Conway's school she is putting into practice her Boston lessons and training. It is a pity that Worcester should lose any part of Miss Murray's services. Perhaps when our schools receive the full benefit of innovations and physical culture comes in, Miss Murray may be recalled to make the scheme successful. Meanwhile, she will continue to instruct the Southern girls in this one of the most noted schools in the South. Her former teacher and associates in the Worcester schools rejoice in her success. In teaching young women how to maintain sound bodies, she is doing a work whose final results she can never live to see.

Amherst.

The only events of interest in the Amherst world at present are the foot ball games of the Eastern League in which the brawn and brain of Amherst, Williams, and Dartmouth are pitted against each other. The Amherst-Williams game at Amherst Nov. 20 will practically decide the championship for 1891.

The faculty is at present considering a change in the scientific course leading to the degree of B. S., with the intention of hereafter giving to the students in that course greater liberty in the selection of studies. The plans for the new laboratories are completed and these buildings when completed will give the space required for the desired increase in the departments of physics and chemistry.

The subject of required attendance at church has been given another vigorous discussion in the columns of the Student. The sentiment of the college is overwhelmingly in favor of voluntary attendance.

Polytechnic.

At a recent meeting of the trustees, important changes in the hour plan for the Mechanics were adopted. A slight summary is as follows. No French is to be given at the Institute, but the requirements for admission in that study are to be raised. Less time is to be devoted to free drawing and physics and more to mechanics and electricity. The apprentices will have more mathematics than heretofore. German is to be confined to five hours a week for the Junior and first half of middle year. English is to come the last half of the middle year to avoid conflict with mechanics of which there was so much conflict last Spring. Some mechanics and steam engineering comes the last half of the middle year. It is understood also, that those students who wish to make up half their shop practice the summer preceding their Senior year, may do so, and that time during the term may be spent in the electrical laboratories. These changes are a great improvement raising the standard, and broadening the course.

The middlears have appointed committees to arrange for their half-year supper.

Students are disturbed at the persistence with which the editor of LIGHT calls the Tech the "Free Institute!!!" If he paid $150 tuition, $30 for drawing instruments, $500 for laboratory fee, especially if he didn't go near the laboratory during the term, fifty cents for a physical examination, 10 cents soap bill, 7 cents for having his little exercises bound and the same amount for paper at each examination, and 4 cents each sheet for "free" drawing, to say nothing of locker-key and breakage, he would then, we think, adopt the more modern title of institute.

Mr. C. H. Dwinwell '94 of Fitchburg has returned from the West and will soon re-enter school. Monday he called upon a few of his old friends.

The students petitioned for the half-day usually given to field sports, and it has been granted. Hence school will close at noon the day before Thanksgiving.

The November number of the W P I will appear Monday with four extra pages, owing to press of foot-ball matter. It contains particulars of changes in hour-plan, an article on "What Constitutes an Electrical Engineer?" by Dr. Kimball, descriptions of the new musical collections, articles on University extension, the recent press troubles at Wellesley, and history of foot-ball, etc., etc. Communications, editorials, college notes and technicalities fill up the remainder. It is an unusually interesting number.

The collection of minerals which belonged to the late John B. Gough, has been purchased and added to the institute collections.

Probably the last foot-ball game of the Tech occurred this afternoon, when the W. P. I. eleven plays Wesleyan at Middletown, Conn.

Interest in foot-ball has been so great this year, that it is probable a very large delegation of students will go to Springfield next Saturday to see Lake and the Howards play McCClurg's men.

A. W. Edson.

At the Session of the New Hampshire State Teachers' Association, now in progress in Concord, State Agent A. W. Edson of this city is an important factor. He spoke Friday at 3:10 p. m., on Topical Instruction and, today, at 9:45 he considers Professional Improvement (with course of Reading.)

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

A standard pitch was adopted by the piano manufacturers of New York at a meeting held last week. The committee, of which Wm. Steinway was chairman, and which has been working for months upon the matter, reported in favor of the standard French, Austrian and Italian pitch of 435 A double vibrations in a second of time, 68° Fahrenheit. The report was unanimously adopted, and the foregoing was declared to be the national pitch, to go into effect by July 1, 1892, all manufacturers agreeing to tune their musical instruments, of whatever nature, accordingly. The new pitch is 17 vibrations lower than that now used.

The original book of words of Handel's "Messiah" as performed for the first time in Dublin, has been picked up on an old Dublin bookstall by Prof. Dowden and reprinted for private circulation. The owner, "J. M." has roughly jotted down in pencil the names at the first performance, from which it appears that My Redeemer" was sung by a lady soprano. "Thy Rebuke" also by a lady soprano. "Behold a Virgin" by a male alto, "For He is like a Refiners Fire" by a bass and "Since by Man" by the chorus. The "Hallelujah Chorus" occupies the same place as now, thus the story that it was originally the last in the work is proven false.

The Fire Escape.

"Look before you leap" is a very good piece of advice to follow, else sometime you will regret the leap, as did the parties in the following incident. It was during one of the late fairs in Mechanic Hall. A young gentleman and young lady were listening to the entertainment but were obliged to stand. It occurred to them that it would be more comfortable to have a seat in the gallery than to stand on the floor. Near the front of the gallery is a door marked Exit, and below it is another door with the same words over it. Now they reasoned that if these doors were to go out of they must also be to come in by, and that a stair-case must connect them. So they started to go to the gallery this way. The first door opened onto stairs leading down, but the second door they tried came out upon stairs going up, they were in the Fire Escape. On reaching the level of the gallery what was their dismay to find that the door opened only from the inside, and they were obliged to go back. But this door was like the one above with knob only on the inside. How were they to get out? One tried to attract attention of those on the inside by rapping, but the other did not want to be discovered in this plight, so they took the only way of getting out, and going down the Escape came in again at the front door. They were recognized by the door-keeper, and allowed to enter without any questions being asked. What he may have imagined as to the way they got out is not told. They vowed they would keep this adventure to themselves, but here are the facts as they happened. Next time they go out of a door they will see whether it can be opened from the other side.

Death Cometh!

"To every man upon this earth,
Death cometh soon or late."

"The young may, the old must die." But poetry and aphorisms cannot reconcile us to the approach of him who cometh surely to every one. Rarely is he a welcome guest. For days he had seemed nearing the home of Elwood Adams, No. 8 Dix Street, but the disease was stayed, the little boy was recovering. It was deemed fitting to recall to her home the little Daisy who had been sent away when the illness proved to be diphtheria. Alas! Her return was too early for she soon sickened and from her loving parents' arms, she passed on to the hereafter. How brief the story told in the following lines,

"In this city, 2d, of diphtheria, Hazel Estella, only daughter of Elwood and Carrie E. Adams, 4yrs. 2 mos. 8 days."

Only a few days ago and the neighboring little ones gathered to make merry with Daisy and her brother over a birthday. What pleasure they had in their innocent sport! How bright the future looked to children and parents; but over all this happiness blew the chill wind of death and blight and desolation follow. Kind friends may extend the helping hand and speak the sympathetic word, for very likely to them also has come the chilling touch, but they cannot fill the vacant chair. A beautiful little life has ended here to be continued in another, and we trust, a brighter world. Many hearts sorrow with the stricken household.

"In this city, 8th, Arthur F., son of John P. and Emily E. Newton, 5 yrs. 11 mos. 22 days."

This notice gives no idea of the grief that filled a Park Avenue home when, last Sunday afternoon, the little boy was reported drowned. One moment, full of childish glee and life, he rushes from the house to the neighboring Elm Park and when next fond eyes rest upon him, it is only cold clay eyes rest upon him, which had quickened it, had fled. No man can describe just how the little boy found his way into the cold waters of the Park, but there his body was found, with his blue cap upon his head and just on the surface of the water. At first, no one knew him, but there soon appeared the father searching for his boy. If grief could only recall our loved ones! While they are with us, let us hold them more closely. Let them, in their early days, be less out of our sight. Let us hold to a strict accountability those into whose hands we temporarily entrust them, then if the worst comes we shall have no vain regrets. Many an eye was moistened Monday morning, as the sad news of the drowning was read. We cannot call back from the echoless shore but we can tell the parents of our sympathy with them.

BOOKS AND BOOKMEN.

The Chautauquan.

The October number contains illustrated articles on the Battle of Bunker Hill, Domestic and Social Life in the Colonies, the Nibelungen-Lied and George Washington, the frontispiece belonging with the latter article. The history of America is still further given in Political Parties, Land Tenure and National Agencies for Scientific Research, which is devoted to the work of the Smithsonian Institution. Maurice Thompson tells of the Theory of Fiction Making. For the general reader there are articles on Social Science in Society, by John Habberton; Birmingham, a Well Governed Republic; and another article in the series on different nationalities: the Bohemians in America by T. Capek. A new feature begun in this number is a page of photographs of noted women, Mrs. J. H. Vincent, Mrs. M. A. Livermore, Mrs. S. K. Bolton, Miss Grace King. The Woman's Council Table has much of interest to women. The pages devoted to the C. L. S. C. offer many suggestions and helps to those who are reading the course. This magazine is for the information of the people, its sphere is popular education. Current events are handled by men well qualified to deal with such questions, and questions of history are treated as well. Published at Meadville, Pa., $2 a year.

The November number of Outing is a remarkable one, both for number and beauty of illustrations and variety of interesting reading matter. This excellent magazine has improved so rapidly of late that it is difficult to understand how the publisher's manage to secure the astonishing variety of high class contribution. The current issue is proof positive that Outing is in able hands. The contents are: "With the Humboldt Trappers," by Charles Howard Shinn; "Field Trial Winners of 1890," (concluded) by E. H. Morris; "Harry's Career at Yale," (continued) by John Seymour Wood; "A Cohutta Valley Shooting Match," by Will N. Harben; "Reminiscences of Irish Sport," by T. Murphy; "Fox Shooting in the Hudson Highlands," by W. B. Page; "Orthochromatic Films and Plates," by Ellsie Wallace; "Florida Razorbarks," by J. M. Murphy; "The Wild Goose in Nebraska," by "C. A. J.;" "My First Tale," by C. B. Bradford; "The Running Broad Jump," (concluded) by Malcolm F. Ford, "The National Guard of California," by Lieut. W. R. Hamilton, U. S. A.; "How I Lost My Thanksgiving Turkey" by Ed. W. Sandys; "A Plea for Style in Boxing," by A. Austen; "Saddle and Scentiment," (continued) by Wenona Gilman; "Football of 1891," by Walter Camp; "Horseback Sketches," by Jessie F. O'Donnell; "Canoeing on the Flathead," by James Ollason; "A Mighty Hunter Before the Lord," by Virginus Dalney; "Told in the Twilight," by Alfred C. Stokes; and the usual editorials, poems and records by the standard writers on sport, etc.

Ingalis' Home Art Magazine, published by J. F. Ingalis, Lynn, Mass.

The first attraction in this number is the colored plate, Lone Rock, with the waves dashing over it and throwing their spray high in air. Directions for painting it are given as well as for the treatment of the other studies contained in the magazine. There is a page devoted to the sketch of J. Foxcroft Cole. We have cookery for the holiday of the month, pansies for water color, something in scorch work just now so popular, some decorations for the house, and several pages of lace and fancy work, in all making a number fully worth the money. Price $1. per year.

The Shield of Love by B. L. Farjeon, Henry Holt & Co., publishers, New York, 40 cents.

We have before us a new novel bearing a popular name as its author. The scene is in London and brings in many types most of them being among the lower class of people. The outside cover gives one a good idea of the inside of the book for a huge spider web with its occupant and a poor moth just entering it are shown. It is hard to believe that such a man as Mr. Fox Cordery ever could have existed even in the writer's brain, but in spite of a doubt concerning his identity we are none the less glad when his schemes come to naught and his intended victims are sheltered by loving hearts.

The Artist Printer, another of those products in which Chicago excels is here for November. Everything in it is practical and good, not excepting Volapuk. "A Chinese Printing Office," showing how little advancement the crystalized people make, is out of the usual line. The letters from all parts of the country are particularly valuable, especially those from Boston and New York.

The combination of ingredients found in Ayer's Pills renders them tonic and curative as well as cathartic. For this reason they are the best medicine for people of costive habit, as they restore the natural action of the bowels, without debilitating.

"SCHEPP'S PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE WORLD."

THE GREATEST BOOK ON EARTH.

COSTING $100.00.

NEW, NOVEL, STRIKING.

A Wonderful Collection of Photographs. Everyone Seeing It Will Want a Copy.

We take great pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to one of the most daring, if not the most marvellous achievement, that has yet been accomplished in the publishing world. We refer to a new and most valuable publication, entitled "Shepp's Photographs of the World," representing renowned picturesque scenery, historic castles, views of cities, avenues, buildings, monuments, copies of celebrated paintings and artistic statuary, collected from every corner of the world.

It includes every thing of any interest through Great Britain, from the Blarney Castle to the Giant's Causeway in Ireland, and from the Hills of Scotland to the South Coast of England; through Europe, from Gibraltar and Italy in the South to Hammerfest in Norway—the most northern town in the world—and to Constantinople and the Russian Mines in Siberia in the far East.

Through Africa, from the Suez Canal, Egypt and the Nile in the East to Cape of Good Hope in the South and life among the Natives in the interior, West and North; through Asia and the Orient, from the Holy Land, Arabia and Persia in the West to India, China, Japan, Australia and the Islands of the Pacific in the South and East.

Through Spanish South America, from Terra del Fuego to Panama; through the Central American States and Mexico—land of the Aztecs; through Alaska, Greenland, British North America and Canada.

Through the United States, from the Golden Gate in the West to the Rocky Coast of New England in the East, and from the Lake cities in the North to the Cotton States in the South, forming one of the finest, rarest, wealthiest, most beautiful, interesting and historic collections of Photographs ever seen.

The Photographs representing master paintings and works of art, taken from the French Salon, Louvre, Luxembourg, Versailles, Dresden, Uffizi, Pitti and Vatican Galleries, are direct and accurate reproductions of the famous originals. Their value is so great that the wealth of nations could not buy them. No collection like this has ever before been found between the lids of any book.

Every photograph is carefully explained in from four to six lines printed matter, in an accurate, concise and most interesting manner. So great has been the demand for this book already, that the publishers immediately translated the English explanations into Swedish and German, printing the book in three languages within four weeks, and we understand that a Spanish edition is now in course of preparation.

The work is issued by the Globe Bible Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, Penn. The publishers, who are wide awake, and know how to meet the wants of the masses, have placed the retail prices marvellously low, ranging from $3.25 to $7.00, according to the style of binding, giving every one an opportunity to purchase a copy.

Mr. E. H. Chamberlain, 3 Clarence Street, is the local representative for this community, and we trust that this announcement to our many readers may prepare every one to receive him cordially. A postal card to his address will receive early attention.

Books and Bookmen

How They Do It.

A few days ago The Sun newspaper of this city published a prospectus, in the guise of an editorial, relating what great things it was going to do in the future in a literary way. This prospectus has caused much comment in the columns of provincial papers, and was, in substance, to the effect that The Sun had purchased various literary matter for future use for which it had paid the following sums:

To W. D. Howells, for a novel, $10,000.

To R. L. Stevenson, for South Sea letters, $10,000.

To Mark Twain, for a novel, $12,000.

To Mark Twain, for a series of European letters, $1,200 each.

In the first place The Sun has not purchased from any of the writers named any literary matter at any price. The purchase was made by one S. S. McClure, the owner of what is called a newspaper syndicate, and what he purchased will be peddled out to any paper in the country that will buy. Thus, what The Sun leads the public to believe is exclusive matter written for and paid for by itself, is a lot of stuff, readable or not as your opinion suggests, that will be published simultaneously all over the country.

Second, it would require a surgical operation to put the belief into the head of any man who is acquainted with the rates of literary compensation that the sums named as purchase price are bona-fide. They are inflated about fivefold—"necessarily for publication, but not as a matter of good faith."

Take, for instance, the case of Mr. Howells. The most successful novel he ever wrote was "A Hazard of New Fortunes." For the serial rights of that book he received from the Harpers the sum of $3,000. After publication in the magazine it was brought out in book form, two volumes at $2, for which he gets the usual royalty of ten per cent. on sales. The first edition, five thousand copies, is not yet exhausted, and probably never will be; and on that number of copies his royalty would be $1,000 more. Then it was published in paper covers at seventy-five cents; the royalty from a sale of eight thousand copies of which yielded him another $600. Thus, all told, his profits on that one novel have not greatly exceeded $4,500. And as that is at the rate of $30 a thousand words, he doubtless feels satisfied. It is sure that no other book paid him as much. Yet now The Sun has the effrontery to state that it, or Mr. McClure, has paid the same man $10,000 for the mere serial-rights of a novel smaller in size. Applying the rule that may almost invariably be applied to the figures of a newspaper—that is, dividing by five—we have $2,000 as the price paid. That is probably the correct figure; for Mr. McClure has the reputation of being the diametric opposite of a fool.

In the case of Stevenson there is little to be said. If you have read any of his South Sea letters you can appraise the price given for them as well as anybody. If Mr. Stevenson were in the South Seas as a reporter attached to the Sun's staff, I venture to say that he would be getting a monthly check for something in the neighborhood of $40. And then the check would frequently be accompanied by a letter from the managing editor, Lord, which would cause the genius to weep and gnash his teeth. However, it is rumored that the "Letters" are written by the young kinsman of Stevenson's wife—the youth by the name of Osborne who works the great man has before now fathered. In that case $10,000 is criminal.

The figures given in regard to Mark Twain are probably that gentleman's figures himself. The great American clown knows the value of advertising—even if he does not know the value of himself. Twelve thousand is the price that most people of ordinary refinement would ask for reading the novel he has written. I should dislike to meet the man who would read the letters at any price. Although $1,200 a letter is more than double what I receive from the Spectator, I am not jealous, but merely wish to inject a modicum of truth into the wild statements that the press makes without winking or turning a hair.

RHODES MACKNIGHT in Spectator.

Christopher Columbus, and how he received and imparted the Spirit of Discovery, by Justin Winsor, Boston and New York. Houghton, Mifflin & Company, 1891.

The monuments of some men are of marble or bronze. Towering columns and shafts tell the story, at times, of long and useful lives. The good that men do, occasionally lives on, perpetuating the history that was all too brief in itself. Again a man links his name indissolubly with a book and to this class belongs Justin Winsor who, for many years, must be recalled as the historian par excellence of America's discoverer. Dr. Edward Everett Hale has recently written a life of Columbus, vastly entertaining for a brief reading, and he can lay very little claim to knowledge of literature who has not been delighted over Irving's masterful volumes. But Irving wrote long ago. Since his day, there have been discoveries, if not equal to those made by Columbus, at least, they have a strong bearing on his life. The biographer draws from every possible source. As the compiler of the most successful History of America yet written, the Librarian of Harvard had already made extensive researches in Columbian literature, when the approach of the quadricentennial of the discovery rendered a complete life of the man and his times desirable. In an elegantly bound royal octavo of 674 pages may be found about all that the student needs to know of the most famous man in the 15th Century. To give an idea of the wealth of matter in the volume it may be stated that there are six different engravings of Columbus, besides pictures of his early biographers. There are cuts of maps of the earliest period, of a supposed drawing by Columbus, and of his manuscript. One of the most interesting illustrations is that of the letter written by the discoverer and for which the Boston Public Library paid an immense sum in 1890 at the sale of the Barlow collection. Every map that could possibly illustrate the subject is presented. There are excellent portraits of Vespucci, De Leon, Balboa, Magellan and many other navigators and astronomers. The Appendix is a very full resumé of the wisdom of the ancients concerning earth and heaven. In fine, Mr. Winsor has left no corner unsearched that could produce the information for this book. The story of the early life of the discoverer, his wanderings, his entreaties and his many failures, all this is told in a graphic manner. Then comes his voyage which reveals another world. The successive voyages follow, bringing to the indefatigable seaker honor and disappointment; glory and chains. Add to the rhetoric of Irving, the illustrative drawings of this volume along with the results of more than fifty years of study and an idea may be had of the value of Winsor's book.

One of the most curious parts of the work is a genealogical record of the Columbus family, from the great Christopher down to a son of Christoval born in 1878, the 16th in direct line from the discoverer. When his father dies, he will become the Duke of Veragna, whose income, some eight or ten thousand dollars a year, is derived from the revenues of Cuba and Porto Rico. This line is from female descent, the male issue failing several years after the death of Columbus. There is a picture of the ruins of Diego Columbus's palace in Santa Domingo. The concluding 250 pages of the volume are devoted to Geographical Results. The chapter is accompanied by almost as many maps as there are pages. Ptolemy with his queer calculations appears and the story is told, through the whole array of wise men, mapmakers and voyagers, through Vadianus, Apianus, Schöner and Munster to Mercator and McClure's discovery of the Northwest passage in 1850.

All classes of people will read this life of Columbus with interest and profit. The student will study it for an increase of knowledge. The general reader will find it entertaining, while the business man will find its pages restful and its illustrations diverting. It should have been stated earlier that the first thirty pages are devoted to a sketch of the sources of information, from which some notion may be had of the magnitude of the task and the amount of sifting necessary to deduce the book. For sale by the Denholm McKay Company, $4.

"Mark Twain's" wife was a Miss Langdon, of Elmira. When "Mark" first met her he was not so distinguished as now. Her father was a judge and doubtless expected "family" and social importance in his son-in-law. Clemens, however, became interested in his daughter, and after a while proposed, but was rejected. "Well," he said to the lady, "I didn't much believe you'd have me, but I thought I'd try." After a while he "tried" again, with the same result, and then remarked with his celebrated drawl: "I think a great deal more of you than if you'd said 'Yes,' but it's hard to bear." A third time he met with better fortune, and then came the most difficult part of his task—to address the old gentleman. "Judge," he said to the dignified millionaire, "have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzie and me?" "What? what?" exclaimed the judge, rather sharply, apparently not understanding the situation, yet doubtless getting a glimpse of it from the inquiry. "Have you seen anything going on between Miss Lizzie and me?" "No, indeed," replied the magnate sternly; "no, sir, I have not." "Well, look sharp and you will," said the author of "Innocents Abroad"; and that is the way he asked the judicial luminary for his daughter's hand.

"The Best of Children's Magazines."

The publishers of St. Nicholas, that famous young folks' magazine, are offering to send a sample copy, free of charge, to any father or mother who would like to consider the question of taking a children's magazine during the year to come.

Certainly if that question is up for discussion in any household St. Nicholas will be the magazine selected. From its first number, in 1873, the pens of the greatest writers of the English world and the pencils of the most famous illustrators, have been at its service. Tennyson, Longfellow, Bryant, Thomas Hughes, Whittier, Bret Harte, Bayard Taylor, Mrs. Burnett, Miss Alcott, Donald G. Mitchell, George MacDonald, Mrs. Oliphant, Proctor are a few of the many great names which have been upon its list of contributors. Mrs. Mary Mapes Dodge is the editor. Everything in it is illustrated.

In 1892

there are to be serial stories by Brander Matthews, Lieutenant Robert H. Fletcher (the author of that charming book, "Majorie and her Papa"), Laura E. Richards, William O. Stoddard, Charles E. Caryl (the author of "Davy and the Goblin") and Frances Courtenay Baylor. There will be short stories by Thomas Nelson Page, Mary E. Wilkins, Mary Halleck Foote, Richard Malcolm Johnston, Octave Thanet, Gen. O. O. Howard, and many others, with papers of travel and adventure by J. T. Trowbridge and Lieutenant Schwatka, and useful articles on "How Columbus Reckoned," "William the Conqueror," "Volcanoes and Earthquakes," "Straight Lines and Circles," etc. In "Strange Corners of Our Country" the Great American Desert, the Cliff Dwellings of Arizona, and other interesting places will be described, and in "Honors to the Flag" and "Boys and the National Guard" the patriotism of the young readers will be aroused and stimulated. Julian Ralph is to describe "The Making of a Great Newspaper," and the arc and incandescent electric lights are to be clearly explained.

Applied Christianity

is what St. Nicholas teaches; unselfishness, faithfulness, courage, truthfulness—these things are taught in a hundred ways by stories, poems and pictures. Do you need such an assistant in your work with your boys and girls? If so, and if you are not already familiar with St. Nicholas, send a postal card to The Century Co., Union Square, New York, N. Y., and ask to see a sample copy. A year's subscription to St. Nicholas makes a splendid Christmas present, for it brings Christmas twelve times a year.

Arnold and Whitman

Not all the poetic sentiment was expended in the earlier days. We remember how Rare

Ben Johnson visited Drummond of Hawthornden, and Byron's lines to Moore will linger in the memory of everyone who has read them; but the scene in Camden, N. J., where Edwin Arnold went over from Philadelphia to call on Walt Whitman, Monday, Nov. 2d, is worthy of a painter's brush. Our Good Gray Poet, confined to his chair, but surrounded by books and papers, was effusively greeted by the Englishman who wrote "The Light of Asia." For an hour and more these masters of verse recited the other's lines, till tears stood in their eyes and joy shone on the faces of the listeners. Arnold, in departing, declared Whitman to stand next to Emerson.

The November number of the Architect and Builders' Edition of the Scientific American contains much that will interest house owners and house builders. The cover is a study, containing as it does pictures of the General Exhibition Building at Philadelphia, the capitol at Washington and the famous Brooklyn Bridge. It has twelve pictures of houses with plans of floors beside a large number of parts of structures with decorations. Many a castle may be built from designs represented here.

Education for November has an assemblage of interesting articles. Dr. Edward Everett Hale could not be other than entertaining if he tried; but in telling his readers how he was educated he certainly is not trying to be prosy. Many will remember his article on the same subject in the Forum, some years ago. Of course he could not treat the same topic without some repetitions, but very likely many readers of this magazine have not read the first one. LIGHT finds a second reading very pleasant. Many teachers might find benefit from its perusal. General Butler's College reminiscences are Butlerian and what further comment is necessary? Wm. M. Thayer has a valuable contribution, "Facts, not Theories, the Basis of Education," while Principal Albert G. Boyden describes the new Normal School Building at Bridgewater. Editorial matter and correspondence are, as usual, instructive.

The Inland Printer for this month exhibits the usual wealth of pictures and information. "The Influence of Pictorial Illustrations upon Literature" should be read by every newspaper man. "To the Young Man in the Printing Business" is excellent advice. For practical every day advice, the Printer has never issued a better number. "The Contest of Composing Machines" is the title of an article on Type Setting machinery. It is probable, that at no distant day machinery will do away with hand work in regular work.

The Dix Trees.

There is no George P. Morris to stay the woodman's hands as he lays low the growth of scores of years. The elms on Main Street said to date from Dr. Elijah Dix are coming down. The sidewalk committee is out in force, but it can do nothing to stop the destruction. The walk on the East side is to be narrowed and the trees must come down. Soon our Main Street will be as bare of shade as lower Broadway or Washington Street, Boston. Trade makes hard demands at times.

The Dodge Homestead in Sutton.

New England is full of edifices whose timbers, were they able to talk, could tell the stories of Indian and Revolutionary wars. The one pictured, on this page, was erected before 1750.

"Georgius Secundus was then alive."

It was in the days when Englishmen talked of Dettingen and Fontenoy. Its newness had worn off when Wolfe triumphed and died at Quebec. In 1750, there had been no Stamp Act and no talk of a Continental Congress. In the history of Sutton, we learn that Samuel Streeter first owned this farm and that it was one of eight farms laid out on a road near the Oxford and Auburn lines, in fact the section is called, "The Eight Lots." The house does not stand on a main road but the walled lane, seen at the right, leads up to it. Streeter probably built the original edifice and he sold to Isaac Dodge in 1749. The purchaser was born in Boxford where he was born. He was a son of William, whose father lived in Wenhams. He was descended from one of three brothers who came to America in 1629. One settled on Block Island and from him came the New York Dodges. The others stopped in Salem and from them have descended those bearing the name in this state. General Grenville M. Dodge of Iowa, the chief engineer of the Union Pacific R. R. belongs to this branch. For several generations, Isaac's descendants lived here and in this house Silas H. was born in 1779, a grandson of the first comer. He was one of those adventurous Massachusetts young men, who, finding themselves crowded in their old home, undertook to make homes for themselves in the then wilds of Maine. His home was in Harpswell, near Portland, where he followed the business of grocer and dealer in ships' stores. He died in Lisbon, Me., 1829. His son, Benjamin J., so long connected with Charles Hamilton in the printing business, was born in Maine but, like many other people of that state, he gravitated back to the old home. In 1874 he purchased the estate and still holds it, though it is occupied by his cousin, David S. Dodge. The latter was born in 1816, a son of Isaac who was the third of that name to live in this house. The place is conducive to longevity, for the last Isaac was nearly ninety at death and David is beyond the three score and ten allotted to men.

Here is an unbroken record of 142 years of holding by one family. Seventy-five acres of land, whose surface has been turned over and over by people of the same name; acres that have yielded a sustenance to hundreds, and the story is not told yet. If there is any sentiment whatever in the human soul, it must be aroused at the sight of such a building as this wherein have been born many who grew here to adulthood. Here they were sought in marriage or went hence to a neighbor's home to tell the "Owre true tale" and, in time, installed here as mistress some adored one, known perhaps from infancy. All the pleasures and privations of a New England life were known within these walls. Thanksgiving dinners, good enough for a king, have been eaten here, and here, too, the aged patriarch and his companion have laid themselves down to the final sleep.

It was a New Englander who had wandered to the wide, level and spacious West. Land, land, land every where. Almost a boundless vision, with nothing to obstruct, yet he exclaimed, "I would give miles of this territory for several rods of the old stone fence that still surrounds the old home or checker-boards the hillside in Massachusetts." Perhaps it was not this Sutton place that he had in mind but it would seem that the boy or girl, reared in the Dodge homestead, must have had stone walls indelibly fixed in memory.

There is nothing gaudy nor showy in the homes of our ancestors. Those worthies didn't believe in French roofs and Queen Anne nooks and corners. They were genuine utilitarians and they wanted lots of room. What they built, staid. Winds, rains and snows beat in vain upon such structures. Plumbers and repairers, generally, would die of starvation were all buildings to be made as thoroughly as this one. The house is not all of the same age. That part nearest us is called "The Rogers Side" in memory of a Widow Rogers whom a Dodge married over in Oxford and brought hither to be the queen of his household. Her first husband, Richard Rogers, had been a school-master in Oxford for more than twenty years. Very likely the new histories of Oxford will tell us more of this gentleman whose widow going to "Ye neighboring town" gave a name to an ancient mansion.

The picture will bear a deal of study. While it can be duplicated in New England, no where else under the sun can its like be found. The aged elms overshadowing the house and giving comfort to the yard are pecular to our clime. Where else can be found the well sweep which lets down the bucket to liquid depths, raising thence the brimming contents. There can be no reservoir troubles on that estate. The stone walls suggest stability, the staying quality for which New England is noted.

Though swarms have repeatedly left this parent hive, never since its original occupancy, has there been wanting a Dodge as head of the house. Generations have come and gone but the house and surroundings continue. Very likely, its garrets, perhaps its living rooms will reveal traces of the first Isaac and his good wife, Mehetabel, and it was a particularly patriotic act on the part of Mr. Dodge to purchase and keep this ancient holding. As a link connecting this active, driving present with the solid, honest past, may the building long continue to cover the family, whose story is so thoroughly identified with it.

What a Fall was There!

The first case won by a woman lawyer in this state was that in Boston, Friday, the 6th inst., when Mrs. Anna C. Fall, counsel for Coleman Tierney secured a verdict for him against the Norcross Bros. of this city. Worcester is particularly interested, in that Col. W. S. B. Hopkins was the opposing counsel. Mrs. Fall is a recent graduate of the Boston University, Liberal Arts and Law School. Her husband, also a lawyer, was a class-mate.

Reform Club.

With President Robinson in the chair, the club celebrated the first anniversary of Thomas Clark's signing the pledge. Congratulatory speeches were made by Alex. Comrie, P. H. Durkin, H. E. Walker, C. B. Knight, J. H. Hession, James Laying and Major F. G. Stiles. Mr. Clark responded feelingly and appropriately and by the president was presented with a club badge. Good work, such as this.

AMONG THE LOCAL ARTISTS.

The members of the Art Students' Club are busy making arrangements for the Fall exhibition which will be held in the club's gallery, 405 Main Street, Nov. 16 to 26, inclusive. The exhibition will include oils, water colors and studies in black and white, most of them being work done by the members since the Spring exhibition. Besides the local members who will exhibit, S. P. Rolt Triscott, a well known artist from Boston and a member of the club, will send several pictures, as will also, probably, several other Boston artists, who are members. There will be the usual opening to members and friends Monday evening after which the exhibition will be open to the public. The decoration committee consists of Miss Anna Ballard and Halleck Bartlett and the hanging committee of L. M. Nason, J. H. Greenwood, Herbert L. Jilsson, W. T. Hunt and Albert F. Simmons. In connection with the exhibition a catalogue, similar to that of last Spring, will be published and will contain more illustrations, from original drawings by members, than the last one. Mr. Eben Harrington, the president of the club, has charge of its arrangements.

Miss Janet L. Howard, a member of the Art Students' Club will teach drawing at Cambridge, Mass., three evenings in the week during the Winter.

An Uncommon Case.

A True Story of the War.

Among the thousands of young men who found themselves in the great army of the North, in the late Rebellion, and who had gained admission to the ranks by deceiving the recruiting officers as to their ages, was David Merriam. He had been caught, in the first outburst of the call to arms, with a very earnest desire to enlist. But, being only seventeen years of age, he found he must gain his parents, consent to his going, before he would be accepted by the officers as a recruit. This he tried to get from them several times, but they refused for, while they wished that the Northern army might be speedily victorious, yet to send her darling David, his mother thought at his tender age was more than she could think of. There was one other son named James, at that time fifteen years old.

David was so determined to go, that one morning he arose very soon after midnight, stole down stairs and out of doors and walked many miles to the recruiting station where he enlisted, and passed the examination, giving his age as nineteen. He felt as if he was as capable as any of the men with whom he was to share the fortunes of camp life. They gathered about him and engaged in conversation with him, as to the probable destination of the regiment, or the length of time that the war might continue. Thus he found himself at seventeen years of age in a position where he was an equal with men of more than twice his age; that position meant that they might be shot down like so much game. Such are the fortunes of war.

To none had David confided his plan of stealing out of his chamber secretly, and running away to enlist, except Annie Sharon. In her tender years, being about a year younger than David, she thought it was truly a patriotic thing for him to go to war, although she told him with grief and sorrow pictured in her face, that she should miss him so much when he was where she could not see him often, and perhaps never again. "O David," she cried, "if you should be shot and should die, how could I endure to think of it." But David cheered her up as best he could; telling her, he most likely would not be gone long, for even then there had been considerable talk that the war would soon come to an end. Then he would tell her that he might come back with some rank, as an officer, which his bravery or behavior had won for him. And as he pictured these possibilities to her, her childish heart would enter into the plan, with her patriotism wrought to its highest point, and that night as he told her he was going to run away and join the regiment, then recruiting a few miles off, she kissed him when they parted good night perhaps forever—and told him he was a brave boy, and that she would try and be a brave girl, and when he was far away upon the field of battle may be,—or in camp, or hospital, to think of Annie as true to him.

Though David did not appear at the breakfast table that morning after his departure, his parents did not, at first, think of it as of great importance. Perhaps he had risen early and gone out with his gun hunting, but on looking where David kept his hunting implements, his mother found them in their accustomed place. Then perhaps he had gone out with some of the boys, on some pretext or other. They believed he would be home soon. But as the morning came to noon, and the day turned to night, and David returned not, his mother began to mistrust the real cause and anxiously entreated her husband to go over to the recruiting station and bring her boy back to her, for she could not spare her innocent boy to go into this cruel war, to be shot down perhaps and killed, or become sick where her tender loving hands could not minister to his comfort. But Mr. Merriam, who had been considerably irritated by the constant appeals from his son for permission to enlist, replied, "Better let him go mother, he won't be easy, until he gets into the war." With this answer he would go about his work, leaving poor Mrs. Merriam to wait out her distress by herself, which she would do by walking the floor, swinging her hand and crying "David, my dear son, come back, come back to your mother, I cannot let you go." Often also would she go out to the front gate and look away down the road; straining her eyes to take in the farthest point observable, in the distant bend of the highway, which led in the direction of the camp. Eagerly would she scan every object, with her faulty eye-sight, which came within her view, as some possible token of her son's returning, while every stranger who passed, when he appeared in the distance, she would endeavor to imagine as David coming back to her again. But as every object floated away from sight and each traveler passed quietly along, bent upon his own mission, hope would give away to fear, and fear to despair and she would return slowly to her kitchen almost overcome by her grief. It was a great joy to her when David arrived home early one morning to stay a few days on a furlough, before starting for the war. How doubly-dear her boy seemed to her now. How queer his youthfulness appeared dressed in his uniform! She noticed that the easy off-hand manner of her boy had given way to a studied bearing. These different features, so unlike the former semblance of her boy would go as daggers to her heart, reminding her of her future, when he would be far away in the camp, perhaps on the battle-field, or in the hospital. How could she devote him to such a destiny? In vain she renewed her entreaties for her husband to interfere in her behalf. In vain she implored her son to give up his intention to go to war, and return home. It did not avail. In hope to calm her fears David would say to her, "Mother, I shan't be gone long anyway, and when I come home you'll be proud of me." And she would ask him if he did not think she was proud of him then.

Notwithstanding the solicitations of his mother, for his heart was bent upon going to war, David returned to camp at the end of his furlough, after bidding his family and especially his mother and Annie, an affectionate good-bye. Shortly after this the regiment started for the field, its destination being New Orleans.

After David's visit, for a few days, and his repeated prophecies that he should be long away, together with the firm belief that he should return a commissioned officer from the army when the war was over, his mother, seeing the helplessness she was in, tried to control herself, and began to look forward to the time when peace would be declared and of her boy's coming back to her.

Mrs. Merriam was ten years older than her husband, who was thirty years old when they were married. At that time she was a widow with three children. Rumor was to the effect that Mr. Merriam had tried to interest her daughter in his behalf before he married the mother, but this was hard to prove.

When her older children had left her—two of whom had died afterward and Mr. Merriam, who was far from being the best tempered man in the world, began to neglect her, for he was often away to work for his neighbors sometimes being gone all day, leaving her many times almost destitute of food, which he seemed to care very little about, her heart became centered upon David, her idol. And when she came to know that another of a more appropriate age had taken a portion of his attentions from her, she was worried; for she felt as her age advanced and her steps faltered, that she wanted some faithful friend, who would stay by her, who would lead her, beguile her weary hours, and comfort her in many ways. No one could do this like David. There was James to be sure—a good boy—she loved him, but David was her eldest boy now living; to him she clung.

The days passed along slowly to Mrs. Merriam after David's return to his regiment. She took great interest in the news of the day, especially in that part which, in anyway, related to David's safety and the time the war would likely continue. David wrote regularly to his mother and to Annie Sharon and they two at length became firmly united in friendship for one another—both loved the same youth, the fond mother, the fickle girl. Each had something to tell the other, every time a letter came from the soldier to one of them.

These letters from David! How they were eagerly caught up by his mother, who would read them through and through, while the silent tears would fall and the loving heart yearn for her boy, who was so far away; and often while reading the letter she would moan aloud "O David David! how can I have you so far away," and overcome by her thoughts, after reading them over and over, she would burst into tears afresh. Thus between love and fear for her boy and her duties to her husband and child still remaining with her, the time passed away.

Month after month went by until they were years and the war, instead of drawing to a close, still went on, with all its sickening details. Her step grew slower. Her eye more dim. Her desire to see the beloved face of her dear boy again, more intense. But yet, he came not. Amid hope and dread, disappointment and love, four years passed away and then came the joyful news that Lee had surrendered to Grant, and that the war was practically at an end. Soon the remaining few of the many, who first went to the front, began to return, and David was daily expected by his mother. He had risen to the rank of Lieutenant and she felt a just pride in his success, while yet so young. How she pictured to herself the joy she would feel to behold him once more—her boy. How manly she thought he must have become in that time. Would she know him? Ah! yes, she did not fear that. In her eager desire to see him she sat by the hour at the window, looking in the direction she knew he must come; but as day succeeded night and night, day, and still he came not, her heart began to sink within her. Then a letter would come from him, saying he should be at home soon, which would cause her hope to rise anew, only to sink by disappointment as before.

One day Annie Sharon came to Mrs. Merriam, her eyes red with weeping and told her she had a letter from David that morning, but she never had had such a letter from him before. Of course the question that interested Mr. Merriam the most was "If David said when he was coming home." "He did not say anything about it," replied "Annie dejectedly. "Why don't the boy come," said Mrs. Merriam in a disconsolable voice.

Annie could not tell and for a short time she was cast down, yet not long, for in some way she and James Merriam, David's brother were on excellent terms and in a few months were married.

Years went along and Mrs. Merriam knew that her life could not last a great while longer. She felt as if she could not leave the world without once more looking upon the face of her darling boy. Her daily prayer went up to her Heavenly Father, that she might be granted this great privilege. Over and above every other blessing, she believed that this was the greatest one that could come to her.

Some ten years after the war closed Mrs. Merriam stood at her sink one day washing dishes. Her husband was out in the field at work, so there was no one in the house with her. She had grown clumsy and lame and deaf, as the years advanced upon her. As she stood with her back toward the outside door which was open; she did not hear or observe a stranger as he came into the room where she was. As the visitor approached nearer, however, she turned and looked him in the face with surprise, which almost immediately changed to one of joy and partial recognition. What hope had this stranger face awakened in her heart? Was this her long lost boy come back to her again? She believed it was. She only waited the word to fold her son in her arms. By reason of her deafness, she was unable to hear the words of the stranger; yet her eyes told her he was speaking if her ears did not understand him. When the visitor exclaimed in her ear that he wanted her money and that if she did not produce it forthwith he would kill her, her look of joy faded to one of fear. She was helpless. She knew there was not a cent of money in the house. What was she to do. The robber waiting, renewed his treat with an earnestness that was not to be mistaken.

"There is not a cent's worth of money in this house," she exclaimed in terror. "You lie! get it at once!" he cried, swinging a chair and shaking it at her meekly.

"It is as I tell you and I could not find a cent if I knew you would kill me," she replied with a calmness born of despair. "Then take that," exclaimed the villain and with one blow from the chair he felled her to the floor, where he left her and made good his escape. Her husband came in soon after and found her in the position where she had fallen. He saw that she was not dead; only insensible; and after awhile she was brought to her senses, by the aid of remedies and in a few days she was able to be up again; but she had received marks from the blow by the villain that she would carry to her dying day.

Not only ten but twenty, and almost thirty years had passed away. David's letters came few and far between. There were rumors that his life was far from being upright, but these were so far fetched, that it was unsafe to rely on them as facts. Other rumors said that fortune had not been favorable to him, and that was the reason he did not come home. These were uncertainties which no one about his old home was able to determine.

At length Mrs. Merriam in her advanced age became sick and it was looked upon as extremely doubtful if she recovered. The doctor came and gave proper medicines, while neighboring hands ministered to her every want, but her vitality did not respond in a way to encourage hope. In her sickness she longed for David, how much only those, who were her daily attendants knew. And it made their hearts ache to hear her call for him. Some went so far as to say that if he was there, they did not believe but that she would get well. But this was guess work. One day after Mrs. Merriam awoke from an unusually troubled sleep, she turned her eyes to the attendant who was sitting by her bedside at the time. A look of blank astonishment passed over her face, which gave way to one inexpressible joy as she said as only a mother could say with her heart overrunning with love, "O David! Have you come at last. Thank God! that you have,—you don't know how glad your mother is to see you again. Why didn't you come before? I've wanted to see you so long; bend over me my boy, and let me see your dear face again." How the mother fondled and caressed the attendant. Her joy to think that David had come back to her again was very effecting to witness. She could not bear to have him out of her sight, and no one could soothe her like him. Her every wish seemed now to be gratified. But her disease bore her steadily down. The time for her departure from earth was come, and of her entrance upon that life eternal. In a short time, one day, just as the glorious sun was sinking in the West, her spirit burst its house of clay, and passed to its heavenly state, with its maker, where there is no more sighing. Her last word was David.

They buried her in the plain little cemetery: there to wait until the time appointed for all the dead to rise.

David never returned to his home.

From time to time inquiries appear about the "Boston Stone" in Marshall street—I enclose a note copied from an old Boston paper of 1822, showing that seventy years ago the stone was an object of interest. S. H. C.

(From the New England Palladium, March 26, 1872.)
BOSTON STONE.

I have seen different statements in this city (I suppose I must now call it), and have been tempted several times to give an authentic account of it, which I will now do.

The second house in Marshall's lane, going from the northward, which, for several generations, has been improved as a manufactory of tin plate ware, by members of one family, was formerly occupied by a painter, and probably was built by him, as there is a carving in wood of a painter's arms, enclosed in the wall, in complete preservation, although, from the date upon it, it has been exposed to every vicissitude of weather, since the year 1701, and is of itself a great curiosity. When the grandfather of the present occupant purchased this house, the large, square stone, now known as the Boston Stone, was in the yard. It is hollowed out in some measure and has been strapped with iron, from the appearance of a groove in it. It was probably used for grinding course paints. Being of no use in the yard, and the corner of the house where it now stands being greatly exposed to injury from the passage of carts and other carriages, it was moved to its present situation as a defence. Thus far I have the account from the late Mr. Joseph Howe. When I was a small boy the shop against which it stands was used as a print and picture shop, the frames of which were painted therein. One day I was passing by and saw a lad named Joseph Whiting inscribing the words "Boston Stone, Marshall's lane," upon it. His father occupied the shop. The stone had never been painted before, nor had been known by appropriate name. After I became a man I asked old Mr. Whiting, who set his son to mark it, and he gave me the following statement: "Marshall's lane was not commonly known to be the proper name of that passage, and it was difficult to designate the places of business in it. A Scotchman opened a warehouse for porter and cheese by wholesale directly opposite to me, and made complaints of this difficulty. He told me that in London there was a large stone with the words "London Stone" upon it, which was a good direction for all places near it, and if I would let Joe write the words "Boston Stone" upon this, and put some date upon it, people would notice it, and it would soon set them guessing what it could mean, and it would become as good a landmark as any in Boston, and he would pay for the paint. I set my son to work accordingly, and his prediction has been verified." Thus for Mr. Whiting. The difficulty alluded to I have noticed in old newspapers. I have one young man's advertisement, who had just opened a shop in the street or lane as follows: "After enumerating his articles 'to be sold at his shop the upper end of Union Street, right opposite Mr. Howe's the tin-man, not far from the Mill Bridge, near to Deacon Barrell's.'" The stone has been painted many times since, and from raising the street when paved, seems to have sunk into the ground.—E. E.

Good to Eat.

Cocoanut Cakes, or Meringues.

Take equal weights of grated cocoanut
(fresh) and powdered sugar, add the whites of six eggs beaten stiff, to one pound of the sugar and cocoanut. It should be a stiff mixture; add egg enough to make it so. Drop the size of a nut separately upon buttered paper in pans, and bake in a moderately heated oven.

Orange Cream.

Eggs are by no means cheap, but this delicious cream goes far. Beat the yolks of six eggs, and one fourth of a pound of white sugar, the juice of six oranges, and a pint of boiling water. Place the saucepan in another containing boiling water, that the custard may not scorch, and stir till it thickens. When cold, put into glasses, and on each put some beaten white, lightly sweetened and flavored with grated orange rind.

Prune Jelly.

Soak a pound of prunes in a quart of water three hours. Drain them and strain the water in which you soaked them. Put it on the range with a pound of sugar and let it boil half an hour. Remove the stones from the prunes and put them into the boiling syrup and boil it up again. Soak half a box of gelatine in a little cold water, and stir it into the boiling prunes.
Pour them into a mold wet with cold water and set them in a cold place to harden. Serve with sugar and cream.

Pound Cake.

Beat a pound of butter to a cream, stir in a pound of sifted powdered sugar, and the rind and juice of a lemon. Beat ten eggs very light, and add to the butter and sugar. Mix thoroughly, and add a pound of sifted flour. Beat thoroughly, and bake in a moderate oven, in tins lined with buttered paper, about an hour.
This cake will keep in a cool, dry place for several weeks, even after being cut.

Chop suet very fine, then rub it to a cream ;
this will prevent lumps of suet in the pudding or pie. Before chopping remove every bit of membrane.

Rice is very nice for dessert when prepared with strawberry jam. Put a layer of rice, cooked rather thick, on a plate ; spread the rice with jam and cover with another layer of rice, then a layer of jam, and lastly a layer of rice. Sprinkle the top with fine sugar.
Serve with cream.

Quinces make a delicious marmalade. So do barberries. One of the best and most delicious of marmalades is prepared from apples and the core and peeling of quinces left after preserving. Put the peeling and core in just enough water to cook them and let them simmer. When they have cooked for three-quarters of an hour and are thoroughly tender, strain off the juice and measure it. Add two pounds of apples, cored and peeled, to an equal weight of quince juice and add three-quarters of a pound of sugar to every pound of this mixture. Boil it down till it is a thick, clear marmalade, stirring it frequently, so that it does not burn.

The following often proves a tempting dish for an invalid :

Cream Soup.

One pint of boiling water, half a cup of cream; add broken pieces of toasted bread and bit of salt.

HOUSEWIVES.

My bread is as good as yours.

Home-made flavors and taste. Grocers keep it. Name on bottom. Ask for 10-cent loaves.

Poetic Addresses.

LIGHT's esteemed Cordwainer friend, John Snow, has special note made of him, at times, on envelopes as the following cases testify:

From Brookline, N. Y.

IN WORCESTER, MASS., AS I WELL know,
There lives a Cobbler, named JOHN SNOW.
At the corner of MAIN and WALNUT street
It were this Cobbler makes boots neat.
He fits them loose and fits them tight,
Your Carrier will had him up ONE FLIGHT,
He nails the heels, and sews the seams,
Away down East, in the land of beans.

From North Adams, Mass.

A finished workman named JOHN SNOW,
Who makes his boots for prices low,
In WORCESTER, MASS., on WALNUT STREET
Corner of MAIN, where both roads meet,
Up stairs, ONE FLIGHT, you'll see in sight,
The entrance of his shop all right,
His apprentice greets you at the door,
With smiling face and dirty paw.

From New York.

O, ho! O, ho! do you know JOHN SNOW?
To his shoemaker's shop do ever you go?
I go, do you, I should say I do
For he fits my feet as snug as they grew.
Up stairs, in pairs, he makes fine boots
For men and boys and tiny galoots.
In WORCESTER, MASS., foot of WALNUT HILL
Is where you'll find his highness still.
He blowed for Allen and all his clan,
But now, of course, he's a Russell man.

Principal Wm. H. Bartlett of the Chandler Street School, has resumed his duties, though he goes on crutches. He is a veteran of the Civil War; but his serious wound came years after. In a race with Young America, at present, the latter would have a decided advantage.

The little stranger who so recently made his advent at the home of Jerome Marble is to bear his great grandfather's name, i. e. he will be John P. Marble Bailey. He certainly has a good name to start with.

Voices from the Heart.

BY CORNELIA WESSON BOYDEN.

Midst the tumult of the day,
Mingled with its noise and strife,
Mid the ever changing play
Of the world and human life,
Through the din of worldly care,
Midst the thronged and crowded mart,
In the fashion's whirl and glare,
Sound the voices from the heart.

Tossed upon the briny deep,
While the breakers dashing high,
Drive away the god of sleep
With their noisy billowy lea,
And the sea gull flying past,
High and low with graceful dart,
While the good ship's speeding fast,
Sound the voices from the heart.

And their whispers soft and low,
Murmur in each list'ning ear
Tide of joy, and tales of woe:
For each human soul to hear;
And when memory's chords are swayed,
Tender tears from eyes will start,
In the past our souls have strayed,
Lured by voices from the heart.

And the joys of childhood's hour,
When the soul was pure and white,
E're we knew man's direful power,
Or the touch of sorrow's blight;
When we trusted and believed,
Knowing naught of wound or smart,
E're we'd loved or been deceived,
"Gladsome days," come from the heart.

Then again a sadder voice,
Whispers in a mournful strain,
And the eyes that would rejoice
Dash away the drops of pain;
And while icy fingers clutch
Heart-strings as they snap and part,
"Thy soul has soared above much,"
Murmurs voices from the heart.

Listen! Still another note,
Tender, sweeter far than all,
As it seems to rise and float,
Earthly sorrows fade and fall;
And the tear drops cease to roll,
And life's wounds to burn and smart,
Healing waters flood the soul,
"Peace, be still," comes from the heart.

Murmuring softly day by day,
Still the voices sweet and clear,
Four life's tales both sad and gay,
In each earth child's listening ear;
And they tell us o'er again,
If we will but read life's chart,
We shall reach a higher plane,
Led by voices from the heart.

George F. Hutchins of this city has given land in South Athol for a public hall.

Dell Hamilton would like to have a 21st birthday again if it would net him as much as his late-ast. A group of friends crowded into his father's hotel, The Waverly, Tuesday night and made Dell happy with a handsome ironwood cane, oxidized silver head with gold trimmings, inscribed "Dell's friends, '91" and a costly umbrella with a similar inscription on the handle. He is now ready for sun or rain. James H. Harrison did the presentation talking and the Majority fittingly responded. Mr. Hamilton was also the recipient of an elegant gold watch from his father and his brother, a diamond ring from his mother and sisters, and other presents from friends. Speeches were made by J. B. Allen and F. A. Frager of Boston, C. O. Wilbur of Brocton, J. A. Matthias of Chicago and others. These little attentions to the milestones of the road along which we can go but once are particularly pleasant to all concerned.

Fashion.

A black gown is always in good taste, and may be worn anywhere except to a wedding, where it is supposed to bring bad luck to the bride.

Handsome dresses of black camel's-hair are shown by tailors. These are made up in combination with black velvet and the cloth is elaborately embroidered with gold bullion. Dainty gowns of soft, corn-colored cloth are made up with short bodices and skirts covered by three successive falls or straight draperies of cloth, each one of which is edged with a two-inch fringe of black ostrich plumes headed by slight pattern of black braid. The front and side breadths are covered with this drapery, while the trained back is plain. A garniture of the narrow fringe of ostrich feathers and black braid trims the bodice.—Boston Budget.

Large English walnut shells are frequently mounted with hinges and used as ornamental cases for rings, jewels and miniature articles for presents.—Fulton Times.

A wriggling gold serpent having overlapping scales of various hues, forms one of the latest queen chains. The tail terminates in the swirl for the watch, while the head holds suspended in its pecked looking jaws a struggling bird of pearls and rubies.

Gold rope encircling an anchor formed of the same material makes a pretty pendant for a glove button.—Ladies' Home Journal.

The small bonnet which fits closely to the head promises again to become popular. It is becoming alike to young and old and it does not, like the toque which has been worn so much recently, tend to spring up off the head at an uncomfortable angle. The small bonnet fits the head securely. The new toques which remain have full soft crowns and are trimmed quite high at the back.—Good Housekeeping.

THE NEW SCIENCE.

To tell the story of the great things the new treatment is doing for its 4500 Worcester patrons would require the entire space of many copies of LIGHT. Every day helpless sufferers send to our office for the new cure, and after a few trials of the great remedy, walk into our rooms to thank us for the great good it has done them. One gentleman who was bloated to enormous proportions from kidney disease, and who had been confined to his house for weeks, found himself eleven inches smaller around the abdomen after ten days' trial of the new cure, and he has returned to business a well man. A lady walked into our office yesterday, who had not been able to stand on her feet for three months previous to taking our cure, four weeks ago. A gentleman accompanied this lady to our rooms, who had suffered untold tortures from dyspepsia and headaches for years. He said he had used our cure twenty days and was a well man. Hundreds of sufferers have called upon us, after taking the new cure, to tell us of the great work it has done for them and scores of invalids are constantly visiting us to report their discovery of intestinal and stomach worms after applying the new cure. Victims to nervous debility are delighted with the treatment and many of these unfortunates call at our office to thank us for the relief the new cure has furnished them. Youth and old age, male and female, married and single—4500 of them in Worcester and its vicinity—are or have been under treatment by the new cure. Ask any one from among this vast army of sufferers if the new treatment is not the greatest curative agent known to man; ask them if cleansing or disinfecting the fountains and sewers of the body does not mean purer blood, equalized circulation, increased physical and mental vigor and relief from pain and depression; ask them if our promises are not fair and if the hope we give is not realized. We are doing wonderful things for the sick and suffering people of Worcester, but we wish we could more; we wish we were rich enough to publish to the world the formula for preparing and applying the new cure; every human being should have it, sick or well; but as we are not rich enough to give it away, we are doing the next thing to it by charging the smallest possible price for the treatment and directions—

THREE DOLLARS.

Please remember, if you consult references, that they are human and that their time is valuable. Thus make legitimate inquiries and short visits.

The following named ladies can tell you what the new cure does for indigestion, debility, headaches, etc.:

Mrs. Joseph Vigneault, 24 Ball St., Worcester, Mass.

Mrs. F. E. Barrett, 19 Wachusett St., Worcester, Mass.

Mrs. Alfred LaBonte, 24 Ball St., Worcester. Perfect sewerage of the body is a deadly foe to Consumption.

Read what Mrs. Larkham says
Mrs. Larkham residing at 21 Ball St., Worcester, says: "All my family died with Consumption, and I was stricken with it and brought down to the very shadow of death. I felt so sure my time had come that I gave away my clothes and my husband arranged our cemetery lot, expecting to bury me in a few days. A friend suggested trying the new cure as a last resort. I did so, and after using it three months, am a well woman. If any suffering person takes the new cure from reading my testimony and are not satisfied with the results obtained from it after a fair trial, I will return the money paid for it."

The new cure is a sure eradicator of piles. Mrs. Larkham, husband of the above named lady, took the new treatment and was perfectly cured of a severe case of piles of long standing.

Typhoid fever and general debility cannot withstand the potent influences of the new treatment.

Mrs. Kirby of 66 Salem Street, Worcester, says: I had a seated typhoid fever, and so debilitated I could not sit up. My physician said I was hooked for at least six weeks' stay in bed. Without his knowledge or consent, I made use of the new treatment and in three days I walked a mile and have been well since that time.

Mr. J. D. Wilcox of 103 Park St., Worcester, can tell an interesting story of what the new treatment will do for rheumatism, and diseases of the abdomen.

Epilepsy cannot reside in the same house store or office with the new treatment. The new cure is a sure destroyer of all kinds of fits.

Dr. John T. Blades of 10 School St., Webster, Mass., can give you his experience with the new cure in cases of Fits and Nervous Debility. Dr. Blades uses no other remedy now, except the new cure, in these diseases.

The new cure is a perfect restorer of nature's wasted forces. The lame are made to walk.

Mr. Rice of 20 Hollis Street, Worcester, says: "I was unable to walk, having lost the use of my lower limbs. My physician gave me no encouragement of cure, but said I was paralyzed. Medicines were tried in vain. I had lost my appetite, and all hope of getting well had left me when I was induced to try the new cure. After using it twice I walked a third of a mile to the horse cars, rode as far as the post-office walked another third of a mile and returned home without fatigue. After a few more treatments I returned to my business, as well as before I became ill, and have remained well ever since."

The new treatment is a sure cure for all diseases of the Pelvis.

Mrs. Parker of 49 Pleasant St., Worcester, says: "I have been under the treatment of six of our best physicians, for an internal difficulty, covering a period of five years, steadily growing worse under each, until it became a burden and physicians appeared to be a curse. I finally sought the new treatment, and after a few applications of it, am as well as ever I was in my life."

A potent remedy is the new treatment for swollen joints and limbs and for watery or dropsical effusions.

Mrs. Brown, 20 Chandler St., Worcester, says: "I have used the new treatment but a few times, and would not take fifty dollars for what it has already accomplished, and I would not discontinue its use for any money."

The new treatment is sure death to tape worms, stomach or internal worms. Worms cannot live in the human body after an application of the new cure.

I reside in Worcester, will not publish my name, but will state a fact for the benefit of other sufferers like myself. I was ill for a long time, and was reduced from 145 pounds to less than 90. Doctors said I had Bright's disease, and they gave me up as a hopeless case. I obtained the new treatment, and after one application found over 3000 intestinal worms in the vessel. I am now well and weigh 140 pounds. A friend of mine had a tape worm, and to her I carried the treatment. A trial brought away 53 feet with head complete. The doctor is at liberty to give my address to lady sufferers from kindred causes.

About Folks.

Mr. J. W. Greene, the well known North End stove dealer and plumber, has just finished an excellent job in Amherst. One of the old dormitories, at the expense of J. Henry Whitcomb of this city, has been put in most excellent repair, so that hereafter the boys will not go to their society halls for the choicest rooms. Mr. Greene has had the steam and water piping to do and, of course, has done it well.

Frank H. Kelley, son of the late Ex-Mayor Kelley, having been graduated from the New Haven Law School is now in the practice of his profession in that city. He is in business with Ex-Governor Waller, the latter maintaining the New York office while Kelley looks after the New Haven interests.

Both air and water abound in microbes, or germs of disease, ready to infect the debilitated system. To impart that strength and vigor necessary to resist the effect of these pernicious atoms, no tonic blood purifier equals Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

Rev. Horace J. White, pastor of the Pleasant Street Baptist Church, has had to house up on account of severe cold.

Max O'Rell.

Our city is particularly fortunate in entertainments this winter, but among them all, no one promises more than an evening with the French humorist who is to appear in Mechanics Hall, next Tuesday night. The writer of "John Bull and his Island" is a fun lover and maker whom all should hear, who would drive dull care away. "America as seen through French Spectacles," and he wears a big pair, will prove a rare treat to all who listen. The hall should be full.

In Fitchburg.

The Evening Mail of Tuesday devotes a column of editorial to Principal Chas. A. Chapin of that city because in an address at the City Hall he used the following words:

A vote for no-license is a vote for the home, a vote for the son, for the father, for the mother, for honest living, for clean politics, for "everlasting right," and for him who sits on the throne of everlasting righteousness.

The Mail's objection that the selling of rum was once as lawful as that of molasses will hardly apply. The holding of slaves was once legal, and righteous in the eyes and minds of decent men. We are not dealing with yesterday but with the bright, burning, pushing today. The Mail's estimate of three out of every four men as drinkers of alcoholic beverages may apply to the writers range of acquaintances but not to men at large. Principal Chapin is right. The saloon must go. Again, the Principal did not preach his doctrine in his school but in the City Hall as a citizen. Because he is a teacher, does he thereby become less a man? By all means accord to the teacher the same privileges that we ask for ourselves.

Y. W. C. A.

This organization appeals to the public for $20,000 to complete the edifice now building on Chatham Street. It is a worthy cause.

It is the unexpected that happens. Sometimes an engineer is run over by his own engine and to be hoisted by his own petard is proverbial. Thus it was that Otto L. Burton, the elevator boy in the Burnside building, suffered a painful injury last Saturday. In some way, he hardly knows how himself, he was mixed up with the lower story of the car, while some other party was running the upper. In this way he was caught, severely spraining his ankle. He will be laid up for some time.

How a Drunkard Began.

A man was once sitting in a saloon. He had an old lathered hat on his head, short black pipe in his mouth, a dirty shirt and ragged clothes, and down-trodden shoes on. But he had not always been like that; he had seen better days once. As he looked out of the saloon door he saw two tidy, clean little children come for their father's beer. As soon as they were outside the door the little girl took a drink from the jug, while her little brother waited patiently for his turn. The poor drunkard looked at them very sadly, and then he said with a sigh. "Ah, that's how I began, and I can't leave it off now."—Exchange.

Music and Musicians.

Miss Idelle A. Clark gave a musicale Thursday evening at her home, 45 Providence Street. The program comprised ten numbers including several solos by Mrs. F. W. Rugles. The work of Miss Clark was specially worthy of note showing thorough knowledge of the compositions and their expression.

The pupils of Mr. and Mrs. G. N. Morse gave the second of a series of recitals, Thursday afternoon at the rooms of Mr. Morse.

The conventions of this famous organization now in progress in Boston are deserving of attention. The World's Convention began Wednesday and concluded yesterday. The National follows and will end the 18th inst. Tremont Temple is the scene and Worcester people can go to the Convention and return at reduce rates, $1.35 for the round trip. It is the most notable and efficient Temperance gathering ever had.

Mechanics Course.

Course A of the Mechanics Association course of entertainments began Monday evening in Mechanics Hall with a concert by the Tufts College Glee and Banjo and Mandolin Clubs. College glee and banjo clubs are always a popular attraction and as this is one of the best among them, a very entertaining program was expected. The repeated encores testified that the expectations were realized. Course B will open next Monday evening with a concert by the Boston Beacon Orchestral Club.

Odd Fellows.

Fitchburg Odd Fellows visited Worcester, Monday last, and the afternoon was made enjoyable by music and regalia along Main Street. It was Grand Canon Hebron No. 2, that came down to be the guests of Worcester Grand Canon, Patriarchs Militant, and a very nice time every body had. Parade on the Common and supper at the Bay State were followed by exemplification of degrees at the hall on Pleasant Street. The visitors returned at 11.30 p.m.

Taming a Zebra.

Zebras can never be tamed, unless the process is begun while they are still very young. H. A. Bryden gives an instance of a tragic fate which befell one of them, captured when he was 7 or 8 years old.

He had joined a troop of horses belonging to one of the author's friends, and finally allowed himself to be driven with them into a kraal or inclosure. It was then determined to keep him, and if possible to domesticate him.

For this purpose he was lassoed and tied to a tree, but so ferocious was he in the presence of man that the greatest precautions had to be observed in approaching him. All possible means were taken to induce him to feed. When captured he was in splendid condition, and his coat shone in the sun. Herbage was brought from the mountain tops where he had been used to graze and every conceivable food placed before him, but in vain; he steadily refused to eat.

Water he drank greedily and would dispose of three bucketfuls at a time.

At length, after three weeks of vain endeavor to tame the noble creature, during which time he subsisted entirely on water, he died.—Youth's Companion.

Aluminum has been substituted for cast-iron in the specifications for the dome of the tower of Philadelphia's new city hall. It will save the constant expense of painting and reduce the weight of the tower about four hundred tons.

Cost of Wars of the United States.

The Revolutionary War cost the United States $135,103,713. The Colonies furnished, from 1775 to 1783, 395,664 troops.

The war of 1812 cost the United States $107,159,003. The number of troops engaged is estimated at 471,622.

The Mexican war cost the United States $100,000,000. The number of troops engaged was 101,282.

The Rebellion cost the North $2,738,763,362 and called into service 2,772,408 men. War costs money and blood.

A Misprized Friend.

The baggage-smasher is gradually asserting himself and convincing the American public that they have done him a grievous wrong. One of the guild spoke out at length a short time ago in The Youth's Companion and made it plain that the so-called baggage-smasher took up trunks tenderly, lifted them with care, and was, take him for all in all, a large-sized public benefactor. Now figures are given out showing that 900,000 pieces of baggage were handled in the Union Depot at Chicago last year, not to mention 60,000 tons of mail and 300,000 packages, boxes, etc. Yet of this immense sum-total the damage from breakage, theft and going astray was less than $150. That is a good record truly. Some day the baggage smasher will get his rights and we shall erect monuments to him as one of the chief blessings vouchsafed to humanity.—New York Tribune.

Christmas Work.

Individual Basket for Shoe Buttons, etc.

This was a very pretty little affair, made in the following way. A round Japanese basket was lined with yellow silk and finished at the top with a little heading, one side being decorated with a large yellow bow. On a piece of narrow yellow ribbon were strung three spools of black twist and a spool of course black linen thread and the ends of the ribbons were fastened to the top of the basket. A pair of small scissors were secured to the basket in the same way, as were also some coarse needles in a little yellow book, while five or six dozen shoe buttons were thrown loosely into the basket.

A Home Made Velvet Brush.

This was fashioned from a piece of black hair cloth. The material was cut in a half yard strip, about six inches wide, and tightly rolled, after raveling both sides to the depth of two inches, thus leaving a two inch strip of the cloth in the middle. The roll was then securely sewed and tied around by ribbon, finishing with a bow at one side. These, with their different colored ribbons to match various toilets, were very attractive.

Wall Pocket.

It is made of one of the pretty grass fans, which can be had in several colors. A pocket of silk shirred to the edge of the fan, and closed with drawing strings. The model pocket was trimmed on the edge with tiny bells, and finished with bows of ribbon like the silk pocket.

White Broadcloth Table-Cover.

A table-cover of the white broadcloth is elegant. Take a square of one yard and a half and decorate with a conventional border design, set four inches above the straight cut edge. Work in a long-and-short stitch in white or in any delicate color of filofloss; work the flower forms well in with the long-and-short stitch, and couch two rows of medium size thread around this. Do the stems in three rows of gold thread couched down, the stitches alternating. Couch the outside line of the leaf with the gold thread, and inside of this lay four lines, following the outline, and running each line inside of the other, until the four rows are finished, when the end of the thread must be well fastened after being drawn through. Line with India silk to the lower edge of the design. This is very Japanese in effect.

EVA M. NILES.

A MAIDEN'S FANCY.

Lulled by murmuring of the branches,
Fanned by gentlest Summer winds,
Soothed by droning of the locusts,
Phyllis sits and slowly swings
In her hammock of woven grasses,
Beneath the garbled old apple tree.

Sits there dreaming idle day dreams,
Fashions wondrous golden castles,
Fills the halls with knights of romance
Shares the throne with princely lover,
All those visions bright and airy,
Born of maiden's wand'ring fancy.

Oh dreamer of dreams so fleeting!
Thy castles soon will fade away,
Gallant knights in flashing armor,
Handsome Prince so tall and stately,
Dissolved like mist the enchanted picture
'Twas all a maiden's idle fancy.

Quite An ther Thing,
You'll See It, Finally.

It is one thing to promise everything that is splendid in Clothing for ever so much less money than established dealers everywhere ask.

But it is quite another thing to make the clothes bear out one-quarter of the claims made for them.

It is one thing to sell you a suit of clothes made to appear like good ones, and you may not be able to see the difference when you pay your money.

But just as sure as the spring will follow this winter, so sure is it that you'll see the difference finally, and the finally may come sooner than you think.

The average business of the day is carried on altogether too much like a game of chance.

The man who works in his shop day in and day out has very little show in a game of of this kind with men who give every moment of their lives to finding out how to make you believe their Clothing is what it is not, and getting your money without giving you full value for it.

They call this sort of thing "business," but when the things fall to pieces in a few weeks and look old and shabby in a month, you use a far different word to tell what you think it is, and your word is right.

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, NOVEMBER, 12, 1891.

No. 12

It is the lonely load
That crushes out the life and light of heaven,
But borne with Him, the soul restored, forgiven,
Sings out through all the days
Her joy and God's high praise.
—The Christian World.

The No License campaign has begun.

Till after the vote, the Reform Club will conduct meetings at the rink.

Last Sunday's showing, with the Hon. Joseph H. Walker, the Rev. Geo. H. Gould and others as speakers was a good beginning, but it must be remembered that talk, only, will not win the battle.

When those who believe in No License can be made to see that it is, pecuniarily, as much for their benefit as License is returnful to those who sell rum, then we shall have the same interested campaign that the License people wage.

A large share of those who vote for No License like to do so sub rosa. They are not willing that their attitude should be openly known and recognized, lest some measure of trade should be lost to them. In some way, at some time, money always comes in and seldom to the advantage of those who seek only the public good.

During the war the expression, "Important if true" in announcing some event in the South became proverbial, for so often the statement was untrue. A realization of this came to hand, recently, in the reported case of Mrs. Packson, mayor of Kiowa, Kansas. It was reported that she had nailed up saloon doors, knocked in the heads of whiskey barrels and that in consequence her husband, among others, had requested her to resign. It now appears that Mr. Packson has been dead fifteen years and that the only truth in the whole report is that she is mayor of Kiowa. Next!

The two gatherings of the W. C. T. U. in Boston during the past two weeks are among the most notable assemblages ever held in this country. The women are coming to the front. There are forty thousand of them in college today in this country and, at this rate, they will soon outstrip the men. In right down practical work against the rum traffic they are far ahead of the men. At this moment there is no name in the United States more respected than that of Miss Frances E. Willard, again placed at the head of this working organization. It requires no great amount of prophetic vision to see that the reformation when it comes will be through the efforts of woman-kind.

Who is the artist who will do justice to Captain Hubbard's heroic act when he entered the den of Anarchists in Chicago and in the midst of demonic howlings, threats and imprecations, compelled these human hyenas to raise the flag of the United States above their red emblazonry. Not since Camille Desmoulin seized the picture of Christ in his hands and shouting, "Make way for the Master," overawed the desperate revolutionary mob of Paris, has the act of the Chicago policeman been paralleled. The scene should be depicted on the walls of some one of the Queen City's public buildings.

Will the Columbian Fair be closed Sundays? A large share of Christian America is awaiting the answer anxiously. They are not all "Canting Sabbatarians" who ask for this; but the industrial world calls for it. If the Fair is opened, some one must work all the time. Railroads must run, and when the drift on the trunk lines is to lessen the amount of Sunday work, it seems hard for any considerable portion of the public to demand more. We need the rest of one day in seven. Shall we have it? The "poor workman" in whose behalf the opening is projected does not ask for it. It is an effort to break down the restrictions, obtaining for centuries among English speaking people, and the ingrafting upon us of all the license of the Continental Sunday. God forbid.

Do you visit the Boys' Club? Do you know what work is being accomplished in Barton Place? The doors are open. Go in any evening and see careful, self-sacrificing men and women striving to make men of the lads who assemble there. It is a difficult task, beset with every imaginable obstacle, but final triumph is promised to every one who believeth. A call from sympathetic people will do much to encourage and strengthen. Go and see.

BOOK AND BOOKMEN.

In Old Quinnebasset. By Sophie May. From Lee & Shepard Publishers, Boston, Mass.

This is the sixth and latest volume in this series, and will no doubt be read with just as much avidity as any of the preceding ones. It is written in the form of a diary by Elizabeth Van Arsdale Gilman at the request of her friend and teacher, Bryce Prescott. She brings in the affairs of all the family, and the neighbors of their little village in such a sweet way, telling of faults and giving always her thoughts and feelings on the subject in hand. There are discussions on the politics of the day, and it is very amusing to hear grandma argue for the king whom she will not believe can do wrong. The pranks of Davy and his father's mode of dealing with him are contrasted well with the way of Master Prescott who, somewhat in advance of those days, does not believe that corporal punishment is the proper way to reach a boy's heart. The results of the new method will please all who read and the method though amusing might well be tried in some cases nowadays. The book is beautifully illustrated and whoever looks at the first picture of Bess making her courtesy before Washington will want to read the book. There is a mystery and a wrong righted and taken all together the interest is kept up to the end, where a happy wedding leaves all readers satisfied. Price $1.50. It can be had of Putnam, Davis & Co.

A Pagan of the Alleghanies. By Marah Ellis Ryan. From Rand, McNally & Co. Publishers, Chicago and New York.

As with some of the author's stories this also is a study of character. The scene is in the Alleghanies and the natives of the mountains are brought in all their simplicity, and contrasted with the new comers from the city who spend the Summer months in that vicinity. Bud or otherwise called "The Pagan" gains that name because he does not fall in with the religious views of the people whom he meets most frequently. In reading his thoughts we wonder if he was not more than half right in his belief and do not wonder that Krin is tossed up and down in her mind as she tries to do right, and knows not where to turn for advice. The tragic ending of Bud and Krin is thrilling and yet it is as it should be, for neither could have lived the life they would. Illicit distilling is brought in and Granny is a character all by herself. The cover has a picture of Krin, a sweet figure parting the laurel over-head. It is issued in the Kialto series and in that form costs 50 cents.

Walter L. Mellen, a High School graduate and associated with his father, Henry Mellen, as a mason and contractor is announced as engaged to Miss Carrie Fisher of Fisherville.

Dr. Arthur W. Eldred, W. H. S., '87, Harvard Dental School, '90 and practicing dentistry in this city, has been elected an instructor in Mechanical Dentistry in Harvard. This will necessitate his absence from Worcester every Monday. The position is an honorable one and the securing of it reflects no little credit on our young dentist and his antecedents.

That magnificent offer for War Memoirs, with Cosmopolitan and LIGHT, is still in force. Viz., $5 pays for LIGHT, Cosmopolitan and a set of Grant's, Sherman's, Sheridan's or McClellan's Memoirs.

The Pittsfield Sunday Morning Call commemorates the beginning of its fourth year in a double number. The story of the papers rise and progress is told in a pleasing manner. LIGHT extends heartiest congratulations.

The November "Fashions" from the Denholm & McKay Company is a fine combination of both literature and fashions. The pictures are elegant while Bret Harte's story increases in interest. Every patron of the store should have a copy.

One of the successful features of the late Methodist Fair was the Cook Book, prepared under the direction of Mrs. John Starkie and Mrs. E. A. Brewer. From a variety of sources, a valuable array of receipts has been collected making the book very useful. The advertisements and the sale of the book must have combined to turn in a considerable sum to the fund.

Printers' Ink for the 18th, has an excellent picture of George R. Kennedy, of the Telegram and the advertisement writer for Barnard, Sumner & Co. Accompanying the portrait is a very lucid dissertation on newspaper circulation with reference to advertising. Nothing better nor clearer ever came even from his pen. He claims and with justice that something besides circulation must commend the paper as a medium for the advertiser. The article is worthy of wide reading and a careful heeding.

As you start out to make your Thanksgiving purchases, don't overlook those people who advertise in LIGHT. There are no better places to buy anything and everything than among those who, from week to week, make known their facilities for serving the public through these columns.

Mrs. Allen of Walpole is visiting her son who is a student at the Polytechnic.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Nov. 21, 1891.

Becker's College.

If any better proof was needed of the success of this institution, it is had in the fact that increased attendance has necessitated an increase of room. Accordingly, a part of the late Arlington Club quarters on the fourth floor of the Clark block just above the main college has been taken and in the new rooms, the short hand department is placed. More than 140 pupils at work in the college give the same a very busy appearance, yet from his office the principal can direct every act, summon any pupil. Hat and cloak rooms are handy and the pupils look busy and happy.

After the adjourned business meeting of the Worcester Art Society, to be held in Colonial Hall, 32 Front Street, this evening, Mr. W. H. Goodyear of New York will deliver a profusely illustrated lecture on "Pictures of Egypt."

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Last week Friday evening George Riddle gave the second of his course of readings at the School of English Speech, reading Browning's play, "A Blot in the 'Scutcheon.'" Tuesday evening he read Browning's "In a Balcony" and last evening he gave Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and three miscellaneous selections. All were given in that remarkable style of which Mr. Riddle alone is master. Criticisms would be difficult, he must be heard to be appreciated. The school deserves much credit for giving Worcester people an opportunity of hearing the talented reader.

Max O'Rell delighted a small audience in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening with his witty talk on Americans as seen through the eye-glasses of a Frenchman. Undoubtedly the bad weather kept many away who would otherwise have attended. The lecturer found a little fault with the subjects of his talk, but was in the main very complimentary and his inimitable style of saying nice things about us made it all the more pleasant.

The third of the Young Men's Christian Association's course of entertainment, was given Thursday evening by the Delphi Concert Co., which includes Miss Gertrude Edmunds, contralto; Mr. J. C. Bartlett, tenor; Mr. Van Veatchon Rogers, harpist; Mr. F. L. Chamberlain, flutist and Mr. Frank O. Nash, accompanist. Mr. Bartlett sang well, particularly in the two ballads given. Messrs. Rogers and Chamberlain also gave very excellent performances. Miss Edmunds did not show any remarkable talent. The next entertainment will be a lecture by Fred Emerson Brooks, the California poet-humorist, and will take place Dec. 3.

The Idelson Quartet will give an entertainment next week, Thanksgiving evening, in the First Presbyterian Church, under the auspices of the Olive Branch Society. The members of the quartet are Miss Lillian M. Dockham, 1st soprano; Miss Dora E. Coddling, 2nd soprano; Miss Lois G. Thompson, 1st alto; Miss Amy F. Coddling, 2nd alto. They will have the assistance of Miss Gertrude L. Witherby, reader.

THE BEST OFFER YET!

You have all heard of Carl's Tour of Main Street. It was written years ago by Clarendon Wheelock, at least it is so claimed, and was printed and reprinted in the Palladium. Two or three years since, Sanford & Davis put it into book form, and sold it for $1.50 per copy. LIGHT is now prepared to offer it to new subscribers, along with the paper for $2.25. You can see that this is an admirable opportunity to get this most excellent history at considerably less than half its former price. As there is only a limited number of the books, the offer holds only till the stock is exhausted.

Our Schools.

CHAPTER VIII.

To those who are acquainted with the condition of our schools the preceding chapters may savour of pessimism; but when one learns what is done and thought elsewhere on this subject, especially when one reads such views and aspirations as the following, one may well feel hopeless of any progress here in the right direction till an important change in the management is effected. George William Curtis, one of the ripest scholars and truest philanthropists of the age, discourses as follows: "Shall we spare any thought, any effort, any cost, to make the public school what we mean it to be,—the corner-stone of the ever loftier and more splendid structure of political liberty,—and to impress upon the teacher by our sympathy and care the central truth of the school system, that the child is educated by the State, not that he may read and write only, but that the trained power and noble intelligence of the American citizen may extend constantly more and more to purify and perpetuate the American republic?"

How is it possible for any one with a spark of patriotism in his nature to read the above and similar paragraphs, and not feel ashamed that our own schools fall so infinitely short of the ideal education above contemplated?

When moral and religious instruction is utterly ignored in many of our schools;—nay, when a prominent committee-man makes it a crime in a devoted teacher that he dares to teach temperance to his pupils; when the graduates of our schools recognize no higher law than that of greedy selfishness and political chicanery, taught them constantly by conspicuous example;—is it not time to inquire whether our schools are doing what their founders hoped they would do, in educating a race of God-fearing citizens, whose purpose in life should be to counteract "the wiles of satan" so earnestly deprecated by the fathers'.

The fact that there have been graduated from the schools many young men and young women who by their ability and high moral characters have achieved success and reputation creditable to themselves, and reflecting lasting honor on the faithful teachers through whose efficient aid such success was made possible, in no way lessens the importance of the above quotations and comments, but the more strongly emphasizes the remark of a distinguished lecturer that "our country has become great not because of its public schools, but in spite of them."

In this connection it may not be amiss to quote the following words of Ralph Waldo Emerson: "We are pursuing antiquated methods; we are students of words; we are shut up in schools and colleges and recitation rooms, for ten or fifteen years, and come out with a bag of wind, a memory of words, and we do not know a thing."

And what else can be expected as the result of our educational system under its present management? It must always remain true that the stream cannot rise higher and cannot be purer than its source; if this be polluted and stagnant, no pedagogic chemistry, applied by the most scientific and pains-taking experts can restore the waters to purity or force them to a higher level.

Hence it follows that there must be a radical change in the whole management,—the "Tite Barnacles" must be scraped off the board, and the octopus must be made to let go the grasp of his tentacles on the soft-shells, in order that our schools may escape to a freer, more inspiring air;—an atmosphere free from impracticable wiles, from politics and pedantry, from hypocrisy and charlatany.

While discussing this subject the writer has more than once been told that he was guilty of impertinence to the committee and to the superintendent, who is conscious that his peculiar qualifications and long experience have placed him in a position to "know it all," and that there is nothing for him to learn; whereupon one is forcibly reminded of the proverb: "seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? there is more hope of a fool than of him,"—however this may be, and however inadequate may be the present discussion, it is evident to all intelligent persons who give the subject any thought, that there must be a new educational system, pursued by new methods and controlled by a larger intelligence, before our schools can take rank with the best educational institutions of the times.

To point out these new methods, or to attempt their introduction in our schools, under their present management is futile and hopeless; for it is impossible to make any important change, so long as the committee can be persuaded, by whatever sophistries, that the present conditions are the outcome of the highest human wisdom.

The necessity however, of a thorough reform in our whole school system becomes more and more urgent as time goes on, while the agencies to effect this reform remain as impracticable as ever.

It is well understood by the highest educational authorities that our schools are already relegated to the third class as compared with others, and it is only a question of a short time as to when they will sink to a still lower grade, if they are to be continued under the present regime. To avert this disgrace, only one way is apparently open to the people, and that is a change in the superintendence. Under the present method of choosing our school-committee this is found to be no easy matter, but surely, surely the good sense and patriotism of our citizens must finally prevail over machine politics, bluster and chicanery.

Grant and Washington.

It now looks as though no plan to remove the remains of Grant from New York would amount to anything. The monument is actually under way, the most ambitious scheme of the kind yet undertaken in this country. Occupying a commanding place in Riverside Park it will be the most conspicuous object after passing "The Genius of Liberty." The amount raised for its construction now stands at $134,734.24; but yet there is a call for thousands more.

The Washington arch over the lower end of 5th Avenue, at Washington Park, nears completion. Its cost is $115,000 and there is less than $10,000 now to raise. When finished the arch will be worthy of the place and the Father of his country. Of white marble, it recalls, the arch of Constantine in Rome and that which Napoleon erected in Paris. Among the foreigners whom New York has commemorated, it is a pleasure to find two Americans remembered.

At Deadwood.

Sunday, Nov. 8th, there was dedicated in Deadwood, South Dakota, a monument to the memory of the Rev. Henry Weston Smith who was slain there by the Indians Aug. 20, 1876. As a missionary of the Methodist Church he was the first to preach in this extreme border place. After all these years the citizens of Deadwood combine with the church of which he was a member to erect this memorial.

It is a sandstone figure, of life size, sculptured by Reardon of New York. Its cost was $2500. The widow of the deceased clergyman resides in this city and his daughter is Miss Edna I. Tyler the well known stenographer.

Hamblin—Tucker.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ephraim Tucker, No. 58 Laurel Street, Wednesday, their daughter, Miss Nellie M., was married to Mr. Frank H. Hamblin of the firm of Hamblin & Russell, wire goods manufacturers. In the midst of profuse floral decorations, the ceremony was performed by the Rev. W. W. Davis of Union Church. The bride was attired in a travelling suit of electric blue Bedford cord with feather trimmings. Rebboi furnished a repast. There were many and beautiful presents including an etching from the bride's late lady associates in City Hall, where she was, for several years, a clerk for the Board of Overseers of the Poor. Mr. Hamblin is director of music at the First Baptist Church. In the afternoon, the newly wedded pair started for Washington. On their return, they will reside at No. 14 Bowdoin Street. Many High School classmates and teachers of Mrs. Hamblin extend hearty congratulations.

Goulding-Ford.

Mr. William H. Goulding of this city was married, Thursday, in Philadelphia to Miss Rose Thomas, daughter of Joseph T. Ford. The ceremony was performed at the bride's home, No. 1617 North 15th Street, by the Rev. Joseph A. Geiss, D. D. pastor of the Lutheran Church of the Holy Communion. The bride's sisters, Eugenia and Florence, were maid of honor and bridesmaid respectively. Harry S. Goulding, son of the groom was best man, while Charles H. Curtis and Lewis R. Goulding, another son, were ushers. Massachusetts people present included Mr. and Mrs. Whittin of Worcester and Mrs. Curtis of Jamaica Plains.

A social will be given by the Class of '90, W. H. S., at Colonial Hall, November 30. William N. Stark will be the floor director.

REV. LEON D. BLISS GOES TO CALIFORNIA.

Rev. Leon D. Bliss, who has been for several years assistant pastor of the Central Church has accepted a call from the Congregational Church of Woodlawn, Cal. It may seem strange, but Mr. Bliss has never seen the church of which he is to soon assume the pastorate and the members of the church have never seen him. The extending of the call happened in this manner. Some time before coming to Worcester Mr. Bliss lived in Oakland, California, for about three years, teaching English literature and natural science in Hopkins Academy and later studying in the Pacific Theological Seminary. When the pulpit of the church in Woodlawn became vacant, the professors in the seminary recommended Mr. Bliss as a good candidate and the call was, accordingly, sent to him. The church has a membership of 140 and is the leading church of Woodlawn, a town of about 6,000 inhabitants. The members were very united in their desire to have Mr. Bliss become their pastor. His salary will be $1,200, with a prospect of an early increase to $1,500. Mr. Bliss left Worcester for his new field of labor this week and will begin his work there immediately after his arrival.

Last week Tuesday evening his former parishioners of Central Church gave him a farewell reception. The affair was entirely informal, but a very large number were present during the evening to give him a parting handshake and bid him God-speed.

Mr. Bliss began to work at Central Church May 1, 1888 and was ordained and installed assistant pastor October 31, 1889. Since then, on account of the poor health of the pastor, Dr. Merriman, he has done a large share of the pastoral work and so well has he done it that all the church members regret greatly his departure. Besides acting as pastor he has filled many other church offices, among them being the Sunday School superintendency and the presidency of the young people's club.

Piedmont.—The Temperance Sunday School concert last week Sunday afternoon was unusually effective. Some very ingenious person had worked the following combination on the word Worcester. Whiskey, woe; Old rye, oaths; Rhine, wine; Champagne, cruelty; Effervescing, beer; Sherry, sorrow; Tobacco, trouble; Egg-nog, evil; Rum, ruin. It was a sad use to put our good city's name to, but it shows to what base uses the very best may come; but later a happier effect was wrought by nine more little folks representing Worcester again. Wake Up; Organize; Rally; Command; Endeavor; Sing; Talk; Enlist; Reclaim. Councilman Taylor showed, conclusively, by figures from the city marshal's books that license is a losing investment for the city. Dr. Mears spoke also, reading from John B. Gough's life.

CONGREGATIONAL.

Though Rev. Mr. Willcox has been pastor of Park Church but a few months, he has already given convincing proof that he is an active and energetic worker. His parishioners become more firmly convinced, each week, that a better selection could hardly have been made. For the pastorate of a young, small church like this, with splendid opportunities for growth, a man is needed with peculiar qualifications, a man who is willing to work hard and to hope and still work on when others become discouraged. Mr. Willcox seems to be such an one. An instance of this was given last week. A few weeks ago the treasurer's report revealed the alarming fact that the church was not raising money enough to pay the running expenses and was already $400 behind. This was accounted for by the fact that the interest in the church had decreased while it was without a pastor and that the contributions had correspondingly decreased. As the only sources of revenue were the voluntary offerings of the members, the seats being free, when these began to fail, it became evident that the people must be informed of the condition of affairs. So the members were told that they were running behind and several attempts were made to raise the money but without much success. But, last week Thursday, Mr. Willcox started out to visit personally the members of the congregation. Soon, one person contributed $100, soon after another added another hundred and by Sunday, there had been pledged more than enough to make up the deficiency. Besides this, efforts have been made to increase the number and amounts of the weekly offerings, and there has been an encouraging response. The Park Church people believe they can build a new church in a few years. Some have already promised to contribute generously when the church decides to begin the work.

Rev. J. J. Lansing completed his fifth year as pastor of Salem Street Church last Sunday.

BAPTIST.

Rev. Joseph Ellison was ordained as a Baptist clergyman and installed as pastor of the Greendale Baptist mission last week Friday evening at the chapel.

At the meeting of the executive board of the Local Union, held Monday evening, the Endeavor Society connected with the Leicester Congregational Church was admitted to membership.

The Endeavor Society of Paxton has sent a request for membership in the Local Union. This will make, when the request has been voted upon at the next meeting of the executive board, the tenth new member admitted during the year.

The sixth annual state convention of Endeavor Societies was held at Springfield Tuesday and Wednesday and was characterized by the usual intense enthusiasm of Christian Endeavor gatherings. The convention began Tuesday afternoon at 2:30 with a praise and prayer service led by Rev. Wallace Mac Mullen, followed by a business meeting at which a new constitution was adopted. Mayor E. S. Bradford of Springfield welcomed the Endeavorers to "Our City of Homes." W. P. Draper extended the greetings of the Springfield Local Union, Rev. George C. Baldwin, Jr., welcomed them on behalf of the churches of Springfield and Rev. Lawrence Phelps of Chelsea, who was the presiding officer of the convention, responded. Mrs. Alice May Scudder read a paper on junior work and then followed an open parliament on junior work, conducted by Rev. W. W. Sleeper of Stoneham, in which a large number took part.

The evening session opened with a praise and devotional service led by Rev. E. P. Farnham. Rev. W. C. Puddfoot gave an address on "The Home Work" and Rev. Dr. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn, one on "Fishers of Men."

Early Wednesday morning there was a sunrise prayer meeting led by Miss Emma D. Gates of this city. At nine o'clock Dr. Michael Jurnham of Springfield led a praise and devotional service. Then came the report of the state secretary and treasurer, H. A. Field of Springfield and the reports of the district secretaries. Mr. Fields report showed that there were 1,100 societies and 85,000 members in the state. Rev. T. C. Martin of Monson spoke on "Practical Evangelistic Work for our Rural Societies," as did also Rev. J. C. Palmer of Danesboro. George W. Coleman, president of the Boston Local Union told "How One City Society does Evangelistic Work," Secretary Baer of the United Society conducted an open parliament on "Practical Methods of work," and H. M. Moore of Boston spoke of "Work for Christ among our Young Men." In the afternoon there were addresses by Rev. C. P. Mills of Newburyport on "Christian Completeness," Rev. Robert McDonald of Boston and Dr. A. Z. Conrad of Worcester on "Ideals" and a business meeting at which officers were elected as follows: President, Rev. Lawrence Phelps of Chelsea; vice-presidents, Rev. E. P. Farnham of Salem, Rev. Wallace McMullen of Springfield and William Shaw of Boston; secretary, George W. Goleman of Boston; treasurer, Henry A. Field of Springfield; auditor, John H. Lingley of Worcester; directors for one year, Charles N. Goodrich of Medford, Edward C. Hazen of Springfield and Miss E. C. Goodwin of Boston; for two years, Miss Emma D. Gates of Worcester, J. E. Griffith of Holyoke and F. N. Chase of Lowell; superintendent of junior work, Rev. W. W. Sleeper superintendent of clearing house, Rev. F. J. Marsh of Walpole. These district secretaries were chosen: Barnstable, A. H. Eldredge, 2d, of Yarmouthport; Berkshire, A. R. Smith of Lee; Bristol, Charles H. Wells of Fall River; Essex, Joseph N. Dunmer of Byfield; Franklin, H. L. Boutwell of North Leverett; Hampden, W. L. Tolman of Springfield; Hampshire, C. H. Johnson of Easthampton; Middlesex, H. A. Kidder of Arlington; Norfolk, S. E. Bentley of Walpole; Plymouth, Mrs. James W. Cooper, Jr., of Plymouth; Suffolk, Henry T. Abbe of Boston; Worcester, Miss Jeannette A. Prince of Spencer.

In the evening Dr. Michael Burnham read the resolutions which recommend that no societies be admitted to unions except these connected with Evangelical churches and which addresses were by Prof. L. T. Townsend of Boston University, who spoke on "Providential Preparation for Missionary Work," and Rev. Dr. F. E. Clark. The convention closed with a consecration meeting.

The Elective System for the Public Schools.

At a recent meeting of the Association of Colleges in New England, the question of a change in the grammar school curriculum was discussed, with the result that the following recommendations were adopted, to be submitted to the consideration of the educators of New England.

1. The introduction of elementary natural history into the earlier years of the program as a substantial subject, to be taught by demonstrations and practical exercises rather than from books.
2. The introduction of elementary physics into the later years of the program as a substantial subject, to be taught by the experimental or laboratory method, and to include exact weighing and measuring by the pupils themselves.
3. The introduction of elementary algebra at an age not later than twelve years.
4. The introduction of elementary plane geometry at an age not later than thirteen years.
5. The offering of opportunity to study French, or German, or Latin, or any two of these languages, from and after the age of ten years.

In order to make room in the program for these new subjects, the association recommends that the time allotted to arithmetic, geography and English grammar be reduced to whatever extent may be necessary. The recommendations are made in the interest of the public school system as a whole; but most of them are offered more particularly in the interest of those children whose education is not to be continued beyond the grammar school.

If the recommendations are approved by educators, they will be acted upon at next year's meetings of the Association.

High School.

Last Friday the debating societies voted for their officers for the ensuing term. The elections were all of them very interesting and exciting at times. There was very little "wire pulling" with the exception of candidates for the president of the Sumner Club, but at the election one man was unanimously elected.

Two petitions have been forwarded to the School Committee; one from the Glee Club, asking that the city purchase music for their use. If this petition is granted, as we hope it may be, the members would be greatly relieved financially. The other is from the Sumner and Assembly debating societies, asking the committee to revoke the very odious law that the presiding officer shall not hold his office longer than one month, but to extend the time to ten weeks as formerly. This law seems to be a great hindrance to all societies. If they would look upon this petition with favor the societies could work with more enthusiasm and would not feel so encroached upon.

The joint debate that was to take place between the Sumner Club and the Assembly does not seem to have come to a very definite point as yet. There seems to be great opposition about the way the societies shall be put upon the question, some favoring club pitted against club others favoring members of both societies placed upon the same side. It will probably be a hard fought subject on both sides.

The rhetorical exercises held in the hall, Tuesday morning, were very interesting and entertaining. Reading, "Jumbles," Miss Chamberlain; piano solo, Miss Hare, '91; recitation, "Broomstick Train," G. A. Matthews.

Next Monday morning, during the first hour, the whole school will assemble in the hall to sing under the direction of Mr. Seth Richards. This will be an excellent opportunity for all interested in the school to visit it and to see the results of its musical training. W. L. P.

Living on Eighty-four Cents a Week.

While on the subject of abstinence in food, may I be pardoned for mentioning that many years ago, when a schoolboy, I tried how cheaply I could live, and found that I was able to get, in Summer, everything I required in the shape of good, wholesome food for three shillings six and a half pence a week. Of course I had little meat, and kept principally to fruit and vegetables, which I could buy cheap, as I was near a large town.—National Review.

There was once a man who succeeded in keeping his horse on a straw a day but about that time the animal died. Excessive economy in food, like the extreme of lavishness is to be avoided. The brain needs nourishment and seeds of permanent disease have been laid by young men in school who have lived on Indian meal mush and molasses or baked potatoes and salt exclusively. Better take a little more time and run no risk of brain impoverishment. Such economy doesn't pay in the long run.

For Light.

Although I am by no means one of the High School "Quick Wits," I appropriated an interest in LIGHT's contribution for them last week.

Have you seen the enclosed sentences? I found them always a stimulating diversion for my classes, and thought perhaps some of the many people who indulge in (L) light reading might enjoy them. The first is of especial interest to the patriotic; the last is not as discrepant as it seems at first sight.

1. Quis crudus tibi lectus albaque spiravit!
2. Mea mater sus mala est.

A SEVENTY-NINER, W. H. S.

The next meeting of the Massachusetts Teachers' Association will be held at the College of Liberal Arts, Boston University, Friday and Saturday, Nov. 27 and 28. Worcester is conspicuously absent from the entire program, which is made up very largely from Boston and the immediate vicinity.

Holy Cross.

The annual customary supper from the Junior class to the faculty and students was tendered last Monday evening and was a grand success. At 6.30 supper was enjoyed in the refectory after which an entertainment was given in Fenwick Hall. The day-scholars enjoyed the supper this year and showed their evident appreciation of the existing harmony. The entertainment opened with an address on "College Sentiment" by President Michael P. Kavanaugh and consisted of essays and poems. The exercises closed with a scene from "Macbeth." The class numbers thirty-five and its officers are President Michael P. Kavanaugh, vice-president J. F. Mellen, secretary David J. Walsh, and treasurer John T. Kittredge.

Rev. Patrick T. Kernan S. J., for many years a teacher at the college, died during the present week. He was at the college a few weeks ago trying to regain his failing health and was very hopeful but the end although not entirely unexpected was yet a welcome relief in this case. Nov. 14.

The Glee Club and college orchestra went to Leicester Thursday evening and opened a three nights' coffee party in aid of the Catholic church. A large delegation of day-scholars attended also, an electric car being chartered for their use.

The college dramatic club will present "The Celebrated Case" in Fenwick Hall on Thanksgiving evening.

Next Wednesday is St. Katherine's day the patroness of philosophy and on that account the Senior class will be given a holiday.

The will of the late Rev. E. D. Purcell leaves almost all his money to his church. He was said to be the richest pastor in the Springfield diocese.

The Washington Social Club will give its annual minstrel show in the theater next Monday evening, Messrs. O'Day, Heffern, Hall and Foley are the end men and the arrangements are in the hands of able committee with President McCaffery as chairman and Mr. J. J. Riordan, secretary. A grand treat is promised to all who attend.

The coffee party to be held on next Tuesday evening in Mechanics Hall by the St. John's Guild promises to eclipse all previous successes. Nov. 20.

Smith.

There are many outside attractions now offering themselves to the girls and they have been largely improved. A number went down to Sir Edwin Arnold's readings at Springfield, last week and also to the Symphony concert this week, while Smith certainly is going to contribute her share to the college representation at the Yale-Harvard game Saturday. Campanini at Amherst and Max O'Rell in the Northampton town hall also had the pleasure of seeing many college girls in their audience.

Last Friday, Victor Herbert, aided in the Analysis class concert.

The ground has already been broken for the two new college houses, which are expected to be done for occupancy next fall. The catalogues are now out, and may be had by sending to the registrar, Miss Mary E. Graham. Nov. 20.

The opening reception of the year of Miss Kimball's Home School was given Thursday evening. The parlors were handsomely decorated for the occasion with potted plants and from 8 to 10 o'clock a large number of the friends of the school and of the pupils called and were received by Miss Kimball, assisted by Miss Newcomb, Miss Havermeyer, Miss Fatten, Miss Laughton, Miss Mellen, Miss Greene, Miss O'Neill and Miss Carpenter. The ushers were Miss Houghton, Miss Harlow, Miss Peacock, Miss Swett, Miss Partridge, Miss Cutter and Miss Duke. To the pupils and their friends these receptions are among the pleasantest events of the year.

Amusement.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Our Angel," a comedy drama of more than ordinary merit, has been the attraction at Lothrop's Pleasant Street Theater this week. The story deals with Western life in the most exciting times of the gold fever. Miss Katherine Rolser as Blossom, "Our Angel," shared the honors with Max Freeman, who is seen to good advantage as Jack Kenyan, who always turns up at the right time. Mr. James K. Keane, as Hop Thompson, a scheming villain, was well received. He is a good actor. "One Hour in a hospital," a farce by Mr. John Phillips, precedes each performance. As a laugh producer it is the best that has been as yet presented.

"The Mask of Life," is the rather dramatic title of the romantic melo-drama from the pen of Mr. John A. Stevens, in which Mr. Charles Barringer and Miss Kate Glassford will appear next week. Mr. Barringer is very popular with the patrons of the house and deservedly so, for he is a talented and painstaking actor, who has made many admirers among Worcester theater goers by the thorough and artistic manner in which he accomplishes his work. Miss Glassford will be welcomed in a manner befitting an actress who has earned a reputation for good work.

Madame Laura Schirmer-Mapleson, who is to appear in Mechanics Hall Thanksgiving afternoon and evening, has a soprano voice of the most delicate character, recalling very distinctly that of Mme. Gerster when she first visited America. It is the voice of a musician, as well as of a skillfully trained vocalist, a voice of remarkable purity and of the most satisfying characteristics. Her earlier years were spent in study under one of Boston's well-known professors, Charles R. Adams, and since then she has continued her studies with some of the most famous artists in the world.

So much has been written about Mme. Schirmer-Mapleson that there is some curiosity to meet the subject of such flattering comment. She is described as possessing an irresistibly charming, frank and honest pair of eyes of the deepest blue looking kindly upon the visitor, and a happy smile greets one at almost every turn.

Mrs. Wilkinson has shown her usual energy in securing so charming an artist for her Thanksgiving attraction. A very moderate scale of prices has been fixed upon. All who attend these concerts may be sure of their money's worth and a most enjoyable evening.

Union Methodist Fair.

For many weeks all the Methodists in the city have been working and looking forward to one grand effort in behalf of Grace Church. The plans culminated in a fair held four days last week in Mechanics Hall. The organ and chandeliers were prettily and extensively decorated, so that it was almost impossible to see the ceiling. The booths that surrounded the hall were tastily arranged and well supplied with fancy articles, and other things useful in the home. Beginning at the north end of the stage there was the booth of Coral Street Church, the fruit table in charge of Mrs. Crowell, booths of Trinity Church, Grace Church choir, Webster Square Church, and Laurel Street church, the chocolate stand of Walter Baker & Co., of Boston, and Grace church booths including flower and candy table, fancy table, and surprise table. Turkey dinners were served Wednesday and Thursday, and suppers every evening.

An entertainment was given every evening. Tuesday the Coral Street and Webster Square Churches furnished a program in which the Young Men's Christian Association Junior Orchestra played three selections. Miss Alma Collins sang a contralto solo, and Miss Lewis played a violin solo and responded to an encore. Wednesday evening Grace Church furnished the entertainment consisting of songs by Miss Flora M. Minor and A. Lester Farwell, and readings by Mrs. Hattie E. Price. Each responded to an encore. Laurel Street Church entertained Thursday evening, the Worcester Brass Orchestra giving several selections. Mrs. MacIntosh a violin solo and Mrs. E. R. Irwin a vocal solo. Friday night young ladies from Trinity Church gave fancy marching and a flag drill. The attendance was large, increasing from the first. The net proceeds for the decrease of Grace Church's debt were over $2,000. All have worked earnestly for the success of the Fair, and now feel well repaid for their labors.

Many of Mr. Labouchere's mots have been recorded. One or two will bear repetition. Once, in the House, he referred to the conduct of some political opponent as being "unworthy of a pettifogging attorney" and, being called upon by the speaker to withdraw this unparliamentary expression, did so, declaring that he was glad of having an opportunity of retracting it, "as it was a great injustice to the attorney." So, again, on being informed that a wealthy nobleman had bequeathed a very large sum of money to the church, he remarked that "was the largest insurance against fire he had ever heard of." On another occasion he was visiting a parvenu, who had a very exclusive library of the newest books. Labouchere had taken down one of these volumes, which had never known the paper-knife. The parvenu said: "Ah, you see, I am surrounded by my friends'" pointing to the books. "Yes," replied Labouchere—"and I am glad to see that you haven't cut them yet." Once, after visiting the House of Lords, he was asked what he thought of it, as compared with the Commons. "Well," was the reply, "I might almost have imagined my self in heaven if it hadn't been for the presence of so many bishops."

Formed on the good old plan,
A true and brave and downright honest man,
He blew no trumpet in the market-place,
Nor in the church with hypocritic face
Supplied with ~~and~~ the lack of Christian grace!
Loudly pretence, he did with cheerful will What others talked of while their hands were still.
—Whittier—Daniel Neall.

Books and Bookmen

The Chautauquan.

With the fine illustrations and the high grade of the articles together with the strong names attached to them, the November number of this magazine makes a grand showing. John Clark Ridpath continues his battles of the Revolution describing the one on Long Island. Dr. Hale writes entertainingly of the Social Life of the Colonists; Prof. Little sets before us the Town Meeting as it was conducted in Colonial times. Two articles deal with the National Department of Agriculture, one detailing the experiments and research that have been made for the farmer's good, the other explaining the methods of discovering the Adulteration of Foods. The subject of Pottery in the United States is explained, and the influence of the pastor in society is dealt with by John Habberton. The story of the Nibelungen-Lied is completed in this number. Other articles are: "Progress of the Colored People in Washington, D. C.," "The Romantic and Classical in English Literature," "The French Naval Manoeuvres in 1891," "The Women's Council Table," furnished entirely by women, contains a variety of information, including, "Social Life," "Women's Clubs in London," "Women as Astronomers."

General Sherman's Letters to His Daughter.

To the November Cosmopolitan Minnie Ewing Sherman contributes some letters written to her by her father during the "Great Struggle." The following is one of them, dated at Memphis, October 4, 1862:

MY DEAR LITTLE MINNIE: Mamma has written to me that you have gone to school. * * * I know you will be lonely enough away from home, and whenever I have leisure I will write to you, although I can tell you little that will interest you, except that I am separated from you all this time. You were left at home when we went to California, and again when I went to Louisiana, and now again in the war; but, my dear child, I am most happy that this war does not reach you. In after years you will know all about this war from books, and may remember that I was one of its actors, but do not think that I feel in this war as I would if England were the enemy opposed to us in battle. I feel that we are fighting our own people, many of whom I knew in earlier years, and with many of whom I was once very intimate. * * * When you study, study hard; learn to apply yourself so that when you are at work you think of nothing else, and when you are done with your books let your mind run free. I have seen a great many young ladies, and know that such are most interesting who are not forward or bashful—the truth lies between. Modesty is the most beautiful feature in a young girl, but should not degenerate into bashfulness. Think yourself as good as any, but never think yourself better than the poorest child of all. If this horrid war should ever end, how happy we could all be in some good home at St. Louis or Leavenworth, or even California. Write to me often, and try and write like mamma. Nobody can write better than she. Think of me as

YOUR FOND FATHER.

Rose and Lavender, by the author of Miss Toosey's Mission, Laddie, etc. From Robert's Brothers, Boston, Mass. $1.00.

The frontispiece shows Ruth, a dainty figure cutting lavender from a great bush. The plan of the story is very simple bringing in but few characters and those of the plainest, every day kind. Joe falls in love with Ruth, or perhaps it might be said that he never did other than love her, but when Rose came his way he left all to follow after her. The presents he intends for Ruth are laid aside to provide something for Rose. After some troublesome times he returns to his old love and the book ends with a wedding.

Little Foles East and West, comprising Prairie Stories, Mother Goose Stories, Fairy Stories, and True Stories, by Harriette R. Shattuck. From Lee & Shepard, publishers, Boston.

Who of the children does not like stories and especially when accompanied by fine illustrations as are all of these. They are all so simply told, the print is so good, and book such a convenient size for the little ones to hold, the price is not large being but seventy-five cents, that we hope it will go into lots of baby hands the coming holidays. The cover is decorated and the title is in gilt. The child who begins this book is sure to be late at every meal till he has read it through. 75 cents. Putnam, Davis & Co.

Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, the author, is a feeble woman of 75, with fine expressive eyes and a refined face. She talks much and well, and still writes stories for the magazines.

Mrs. Mary J. Holmes, the famous writer, is spending a few days in this city.

Mostly Marjorie Day is the title of a new novel by Virginia F. Townsend, which Messrs. Lee and Shepard have nearly ready. It is several years since the author's previous story, A Boston Girl's Ambitions, was given to the public.

The December number of Lippincott's Magazine will be a special Southern number. All the contributions have been prepared by popular Southern authors. The complete novel is by T. C. De Leon, author of Creole and Puritan, The Puritan's Daughter, etc. It is an exciting romance of the civil war, and is entitled A Fair Blockade-Breaker.

D. C. Heath & Co. will publish shortly Reading and Speaking: Familiar Talks to Young Men who would Speak well in Public. By Brainard Gardner Smith, Associate Professor of Elocution and Oratory, Cornell University.

The aim of this book is to help young men to natural, comfortable, manly, forceful manner of speech in public. To accomplish this, the author offers many suggestions not usually found in print. He suggests methods whereby the reader may ascertain for himself what faults he has: faults of breathing, faults of articulation, faults of voice production, faults of manner, faults of gesture, and the like. The reader is also told how these faults may be cured.

Especial importance is given to the theory of Sentential Delivery as based on the systems of Walker and Mandeville.

A feature of the book is a chapter giving letters to the author from such representative American orators and scholars as the Hon. George William Curtis, Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, President Seth Low, the Hon. John D. Long, Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, and others. The book is intended, not only as a text-book for colleges and higher schools, but also for the use of all persons interested in the "noble art of oratory."

A work which is sure to command attention, especially from all who are interested in sociological questions, is from Lee and Shepard. It is called White Slaves, or, Oppression of the Worthy Poor, by the Rev. Louis Albert Banks, D. D., and is the outcome of personal observation by the author, of the sweating system and kindred evils among the poor of Boston, being fully illustrated from photographs.

All Around the Year, 1892. Entirely new design in colors, by J. Pauline Santer. Printed on heavy card board, gilt edges, with chain, tassels, and ring. Size 4 1/4 by 5 1/2 inches. Binded. Price 50 cents.

This most charming calendar is composed of heavy, gilt-edged cards, tastily tied with white silk cord, and a delicate, silvered chain attached by which they may be hung on the wall or elsewhere, and are so arranged on rings that they may be turned over as each month shall be needed for reference.

As fresh in design—even outshining its brilliant host of predecessors, which have been sent out each year to the calendar loving world—as it is fresh in the fair whiteness and the soft delicacy of its workmanship. Each card contains not only the calendar but a design both charming and appropriate, and an equally timely sentiment.

It is a study for an artist—in fact twelve studies in art, of original and beautiful designs, and worked out in the highest style of the printer's art. The drawings are in Mrs. Santer's picturesque style and executed in sepia tint and color,—so quaint and bright and sweet that one is charmed beyond expression.

Each month has its own beautiful design. In January a darling little girl sympathizes with the snow birds. In February she scornfully refuses a valentine; March, she finds tempestuous; May brings the flowers; September carries her to school again and in December she anxiously awaits old Santa Claus. From Lee & Shepard, Boston.

Grandfather Grey, poem, by Kate Tannatt Woods. Illustrations by Charles Copeland. Elegantly printed on fine cut paper. Bound in two colors cloth, full gilt. Lee & Shepard, Boston.

A companion to Grandmother Grey, that pretty love poem of "ye olden time" that sprang into instant favoritism a year ago. There is the same charming simplicity of style and strength and beauty of thought. It is an idyl of old New England, told with exquisite faithfulness by both pen and pencil. The artist, Charles Copeland, has caught the evil spirit that breathes from the lines, and pictured those quaint scenes of wooing and merriment with delicacy and power. The full page frontispiece portrait of Grandfather Grey, as he sits lost in thoughts of by-gone days, shows the same calm, faraway look shining from the eyes, as marked the sweet countenance of Grandmother Grey. Even the hush in the school-room and the hum of the lazy Summer day outside seem real to us. Fair and winsome is the face bent modestly before the parson in the simple wedding scene; years after, it shows traces of life's bitterness as well as sweetness, as she sits by the open window, looking out across the meadows. We can almost see the shadows on the wall of the evening spelling-school bob merrily up and down in the flickering candle-light,—and the twilight deepen on those two old graves in the churchyard.

"For the world moves on as it ever moved,
And the dead as God loveth all."

The writer made an excellent impression in Worcester, last year, when she attended the tenth anniversary of the Woman's Club and may well be anxious to see this most beautiful volume which so mirrors her own thoughts and heart. Looking Backward begins with every one, sooner or later, and as far as the reader may go, he will find the sentiment in full accord with what he has experienced.

This poem is printed on fine cut paper, royal 8vo in size, and richly bound in two colors, embellished with gilt. Price $2.00, Putnam, Davis & Co.

Glimpses at the Plant World by Fanny D. Bergen, Boston, Lee & Shepard. 75 cents.

In the midst of so much fiction which nearly every one reads to the neglect of history, biography and science, it is a genuine pleasure to see a book on plants so entertaining as to cause a young miss to exclaim, "Oh, Papa! Please may I have that book?" That is just the reception that this volume received and it merited all the praise given it. Here are twenty-seven chapters, on the growth and nature of plants, every one of which makes the reader a closer observer of nature. The boy or girl who follows this book closely will soon wish a larger treatise that the field of knowledge may be increased. The simple yet quiet way in which the story is told wins and holds the attention of older as well as younger readers. A choice book for every teacher's desk, it is well placed if put into the children's hands. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

The Lovers Year-Book of poetry. A collection of love poems for every day in the year, by Horace Parker Chandler. Vol. 1, January to June. Boston, Roberts Brothers, 1891, $1.25.

This book might be called, with propriety, the Lover's Vade Mecum. While older people may read and remember their own younger days, that one who is now

"Sighing like furnace, with a woful ballad, Made to his mistress' eyebrows;"

will find the volume more useful. From one hundred different writers, the industrious compiler has drawn sentiments which are here accorded to the days from New Year's Day to the last day of June. The cry of the age is for every thing handy and here the over-worked lover has his sentiments so arranged that he will not even have to turn to his Bartlett's Dictionary of Quotations. The compilation reminds one a little of the Birth Day books which have been made up from the writings of almost all the later famous authors, only there are no spaces for signatures. It is simply a source of pleasure to the possessor to turn to dates with which he is familiar and find what live thought is coupled with it. The probabilities are that the purchaser will first look at his own birthday and then at that of his affianced or the being whom he would call his own. Mr. Chandler must have discovered a lacking in this particular direction and has supplied it. The book itself is a triumph of the binders art in its whole book, olive green sides and gilt titles. For sale at all the book stores.

The October number of the Magazine of New England History completes the first volume. Mr. Tilly of Newport, R. I., in carrying through his venture is entitled to a deal of credit. The field is wide enough for a large number of historical publications. Leisure and wealth have combined to produce a taste for such matter among our people and there are not waiting those who would supply it. Mr. Hulme of New Bedford continues his extracts from Samuel Hubbard's Letter Book; English Homes of the ancestors of the Seventh Day Baptist Clarks follows. There is an appetizing reference to the forthcoming Cartwright Family Genealogy, and a chapter is given to the Record of Baptisms and Marriages of Montville, Conn., 1784-1798. As is usual in such magazines, the Notes and Queries, every body's field, are very valuable. The far reaching effect of such contributions cannot be estimated. Published by R. H. Tilly, Newport, R. I. $2.00 per year.

Who Would not be a Prince

An entire battery of Royal Artillery, considerably over a hundred horses and a similar number of men, was brought up all the way from Woolwich to London by rail, the other day, in order to fire a salute of twenty-one guns in St. James's Park in honor of the birth of the youngest son of Prince Henry of Battenburg and of Princess Beatrice, his wife. In the days prior to his marriage, when he and his elder brother, Prince Alexander, were mere cavalry subalterns at Berlin, they had much difficulty to make both ends meet. Indeed, Prince Henry is known to have been heavily in debt at the time of his marriage. There were grave doubts as to the legitimacy of their father, Prince Alexander of Hess, while their mother, a mere morgantic wife, was of extremely plebeian origin. Her brother was killed while fighting in the revolutionary ranks during the Polish insurrection, while her father was a Hebrew, who had worked his way up from the very lowest position to that of confidential adviser of the late Grand Duke Constantine.

His Flag.

No bird belated sings
In the clm, whose leaves are fled,
Beside the river that darkly clings
Around the place of the dead.

The token-flowers have gone
From the mounds by the marbles white,
Whereon the front of the night and dawn
Slow mix in the day's cold light.

One humble grave is here,
Near these rich stones to the dead,
With a faded flag o'er its grasses sere,
And an iron slab at its head.

And the winds, like a trumpet's sound,
From the fortress-hillside start;
And, sweeping above the hero's mound,
They shake the flag of his heart!

A Young American.

Some of the best things told at the recent Woman's Congress were not spoken from the platform, but related in the ante-rooms. The following story was told to the present writer, by the mother of the little boy in question.

A seven-year-old Chicago boy, who has two presidents of Harvard among his grandfathers and great-grandfathers, lately asked his mother, "Am I going to college when I grow up?"

"I hope so," she answered.

"Am I going to Harvard?"

"I don't know."

"I think I must go to Harvard, because of my name first," said the little boy. [He is named for one of the Harvard grandfathers.] After some further meditation, he asked: "Will my little sister go to college with me?"

His mother explained to him that his sister could not enter Harvard with him by the front door, but that she could enter by the back door. After hearing an explanation of the Annex, the small boy said sturdily:

"Well, I won't go to any college that won't let my sister come in with me by the front door!"

This same little boy is a strong believer in equal rights for women in all respects. Before the recent excitement had arisen over school suffrage in Illinois, he said to his mother suddenly, on the eve of election day: "Why, mother, after all the talk you have given to father about voting, you haven't voted yourself to-day!" Apparently his mother had been reminding her husband not to forget to vote. She explained to the child that she could not vote. He was much astonished and distressed.

"Isn't father willing you should vote?"

"Oh, yes, your father would be willing; but other men have made it a law that women must not vote."

"Well," said the youthful champion of equal rights, "I think father might make the other men let you vote. I think you know enough!"

Twenty years from now, if Illinois women have not secured full suffrage by that time, this boy will be a good man to send to the Legislature. His mother says that his advocacy of equal suffrage is the more remarkable as she has never talked to him upon the subject. "He evolved it from his own inner consciousness," she said.—Woman's Journal.

The First Edition.

"DEAR SIR: We take pleasure in announcing to you that the first edition of your work, "The Swallows," being sold, a second edition should be printed. Have the kindness to call at our office, so that we may make the necessary arrangements. Yours truly,

MASSOL BROTHERS,
"Publishers"

When I received this letter, said the celebrated dramatic author, Henry Didier, I was overcome with joy and astonishment, but I was even more astonished than delighted.

The first edition of "The Swallows," my first work, a volume of poetry, exhausted! And I was barely twenty-two years old, I knew no one in Paris, nothing else of mine had ever been printed except some advertisements! And in what space of time had this unexpected and astounding result been achieved? In a single month! Then it was a success, a real success? So I had talent? I began to be appreciated by my contemporaries whom I hitherto slandered, accusing them of being insensitive to all poetry, and regarding them as stupid country louts.

What a future was before me! After this volume I would write a second one, at which I had already worked—in fancy! Then I would produce something for the theater, the spring board which launches you, all at once into renown glory, and prosperity. And why not a novel, also? I began to dream of psychological essays with descriptive scenes, which should be both exact and interesting. My brain was on fire. All the wild ambitions of youth whispered in my ear. I read the welcome letter again and again. I walked around and around my room gesticulating violently.

"Well, what does this mean, my dear boy?"

My grandfather's face appeared at the door. A kindly face, closely shaven, with a large nose, bright eyes shining behind spectacles, a well combed wig encircling a smiling countenance.

"Why, grandfather, just read this letter."

When he had perused, he said:

"Well, what of that? It seems to me that your poems are charming."

"But just think, grandfather, it is an unexpected success. Nobody reads poetry nowadays."

"People read yours, it seems. You ought to be satisfied."

"Of course I am."

"Then you are happy?"

"Can you doubt it?"

"No more could be desired."

He opened his snuff-box and took a pinch, looking at me with smiling eyes.

A quarter of an hour later I was at Massol's store. I sprang up the stairs to the office of the elder brother, who was accustomed to treat with authors.

The door of the office was closed and a sound of voices escaped. The publisher was engaged. I sat down upon a bench and waited my turn. And as I waited, I recalled my emotion on my first visit to the publishing house; how my heart beat as I mounted the stairs with my manuscript under my arm, and how I trembled when I entered Massol's office.

The office-door opened and X—, a member of the Academy, came out, accompanied by the smiling and obsequious publisher.

He was a successful author, and they made much of him. Would I ever climb so high?

Massol beckoned to me in a kindly and paternal manner. He begged me to be seated, and, installing himself in his arm-chair said:

"You received your letter?"

"Yes, Mr. Massol."

"A book of poetry sold in a month! Between ourselves, I don't understand it all."

This was not very flattering, but I myself had been so much astonished that I readily excused his astonishment.

"Very curious about your book," he continued; "people buy it, but no one talks about it. I never before saw anything like that in the publishing business. Very curious, very curious!"

And he laughed heartily.

It was then and there agreed that they would at once print five hundred copies of "The Swallows," as more orders might reasonably be expected. And a few days later I saw my dear volume majestically displayed in the windows of the book stores, adorned with the flattering inscription: Second Edition.

Decidedly I amounted to something. Nevertheless, Massol's remarks did trouble me a little. No one talked about my book, no one seemed to have read it, except the persons to whom I presented it, and they had not said very much.

Encouraged by this first success, I went eagerly to work. I wrote my first play, "The Grandmother," which, as you recollect, was successful at the Odéon; then I wrote "The Victims of Marriage," for the Gymnase; "The Two Brothers," for the Comédie Française, and many other pieces. I became a "well known author," as we say: years passed and I scarcely recollected "The Swallows," a youthful work, a timid attempt, now forgotten by the world.

At this period I experienced one of the greatest griefs of my life: I lost my dear grandfather. He died peacefully, tended and beloved by all of us to the last. He possessed one of those rare natures in which egotism never found a place, and whose active good-will never spared any pains to give pleasure to those whom he loved.

I shall always remember the painful impression which we experienced, when, a month after the death of this dear relative, we went into his apartments, where we found the old furniture and the familiar objects which reminded us of him. A strange servant opened the blinds abruptly, being indifferent to an emotion he could not understand. The light from without suddenly filled the rooms, and with it, entered a breath of fresh air, bringing in the noise of the street. Death gave way to life. And, with life, its stern duties, the apartments of our dear grandfather were to be rented, and we must remove the furniture, empty the closets, and clear away for the new-comer who was to occupy the rooms. The removing was begun and I was painfully affected. It seemed to me that all that yet remained to recall my grandfather was about to be scattered and broken up.

The regular mode of life which had existed for more than thirty years seemed to have left its mark in every part of this little abode. Each piece of furniture removed and each drawer emptied, was a memory stirred and uprooted. One of the company uttered an astonished "Oh!" and showing me the lower portion of a closet which he had just opened, cried:

"Henry, see here!"

I looked and I saw—oh? dear grandfather, dear and excellent man!—I saw the lower shelves of the closet filled with books all alike, leaves uncut, and blue covers, which I recognized at once, "The Swallows?" "The Swallows!"

There it was complete, the first edition of my poems, this edition which was exhausted so rapidly, "which people bought and of which no one spoke," as Massol had said. I should think they didn't speak of it! Grandfather had bought the whole edition; he was the unknown public!—Epoch translation from the French of Jacques Normand by Richard H. Buel.

Don't Despise the Toadstool.

A thoughtless man, says the New York Sun, wandering through the woods, caught sight of a cluster of giant toadstools growing at the foot of a tree, and began to slash them with his walking stick.

"Now what on earth did you want to do that for?" asked his thoughtful companion.

"Why, they're no good. They're poisonous and unsightly, too," replied the cane-wielder.

"Well," retorted the thoughtful man, "they're one of the most useful things that grow. They are excellent proof of the old chestnut that everything in nature has its use and value to man."

"It's the first time I ever heard it," said the thoughtless man, dubiously, whereupon the thoughtful one, at the very first opportunity, took the thoughtless one into a big city drug store. Heaped high in a glass case on one of the glass counters were hundreds of odd-shaped things that looked like pieces of chamois skin. It was all odorless and as white as velvet almost to the touch,

"What are they?" asked the thoughtless man, in surprise.

"Dried toadstools," replied the thoughtful man.

"Nobody ought to be without them," chimed in the druggist. "There isn't a better simple cure for nosebleed known than a bit of toadstool thrust into the bleeding nostril. Toad stools make excellent dressing for certain kinds of wounds, are highly valued by surgeons, and are in big demand in hospitals. Germans use toadstools extensively as pipe lighters also. The dried fungus makes perfect tinder. It is cut in long strips, and these in turn are clipped at the edge in a sort of fringe and tipped with phosphorus and sulphur just like match heads. By rubbing the fringe against any rough surface, it ignites just like a match, and burns like punk. If you trust a bit into the bowl of your pipe you can light the tobacco with ease in the highest wind, in the biggest storm. In fact the harder it blows the better your pipe will light. Hunters and fishermen find this sort of match much preferable to any other. A dried toadstool makes a curiosity, too, for it is astonishing how few people know what it is when they see it.—July Amateur Sportsman.

The Unsuccessful Man.

There are but few men, today, who desire to be unsuccessful, yet the world is full of such. There are several ways in which we can tell the unsuccessful man. When we see a man going about, day after day, with his head down, and despondency written in every feature of his face, we may put him down at once as unsuccessful.

We may see others careless and indifferent to business and family cares; they spend their time in gambling and carousing around the city, day and night. Yet such men are always unsuccessful.

A young man enters a store as a clerk, a customer comes in to purchase some goods; the clerk half waits upon him, and at the least thing gets provoked: or the customer may call for some article out of season; it may be a little inconvenient for the clerk to get at it; and as the eyes of the employer are not at that moment upon him, he refuses to go after it. The customer at once reports to the proprietor, and the clerk is reprimanded for his neglect, or, as is generally the case, he is discharged. This clerk desires another position. He must have a recommendation from his past employer. This he cannot procure and is thus rejected. He growls at his hard luck, as he calls it, and calls his late employer hard names, and thinks him a very unjust man; while it is all his own fault that he is unsuccessful.

Another clerk is very active when at the store, but he is ever desirous to be away, first to this thing and then to that, consequently he is away half of the time. When he is needed he is not there. His mind gets occupied with outside matters; he has not time nor room for the business in which he is engaged. His employer sees his negligence, and, after his patience has been exhausted, discharges him. The clerk secures another situation, but he does exactly as he had done before, and, although he has great ability, he is again discharged. As long as he continues to neglect his business, he will remain unsuccessful.

Another man is tempted to steal; he gives in to the temptation, he is found out and branded as a thief; he had not manhood enough to start over and be honest. He says that he might as well die for a sheep as a lamb; so he disregards the advice of friends; he shuns the society of the good and chooses instead, the society of the wicked. He goes from bad to worse until at last he dies unsuccessful in all that he good.

Other men go to their business reluctantly, in the morning, and do what is only absolutely necessary. They do not inquire within themselves why their work is done, or, what will be the results if it is not done. They do not try to see how they can improve their work, nor make something which will answer better than the thing they are working upon.

There are men who run engines, who do not know how one is made, nor the duty that each part performs; there are men who sell furniture who do not know of what wood the furniture is made; and men who cannot tell whether the clothes they sell are made of cotton, or wool, or shoddy or all of the three in one. These men are always unsuccessful.

Sometimes it is but a little thing in life, perhaps done on the impulse of the moment, which results in a man's downfall. I will quote a little instance which will give a clearer idea of my meaning. A man who was doing a good business, went by a house that was in process of building. As he went by he saw some lime and sand being mixed for plastering for the house. He thought that if he could take but a small piece of the lime, just enough to white-wash his fence, no one would be the wiser. On looking around and seeing on one, he slipped a small piece into his pocket, and then went home thinking no more about it. There happened to be a man of influence near who saw him take the lime. He thought that if this man will steal a little lime, he will steal on a larger scale. (This of course seems a trifle, but when you consider what it costs this man in the end, it seems larger.) Men for whom he was doing business, on hearing of this little act of theft, at once took their business out of his hands. He was also refused the position as president of a bank, simply on account of this one act. Surely the way of the transgressor is hard.

While there are tides in the affairs of men, which if taken at the flood, will lead to success, yet these men let them slip through their fingers, and worry along through life unsuccessful in all they attempt to do.

Often have we read of men who have tried to reap success by false representations, and some have made enormous sums in this way, but, as is generally the case, it brings them no good. Others think that men ought to respect and honor them, and at the same time they do nothing to incur their respect, and as they fail in this they try either to destroy themselves or those with whom they deal, instead of looking into themselves, and seeing their own faults, overcoming them, and by so doing reap the respect of those around them.

If a young man should come to me, and ask me for a remedy for unsuccessfulness, I should at once tell him to "Love the Lord with all his heart, and his neighbor as himself." And if every man and woman would follow this, they would at once see a revival in themselves, and also in their surroundings. Their poor stagnant blood would at once commence a process of purification. Life would be imparted to their business, people at once would put confidence in them. They would slowly rise step by step until the dregs of failure would fall at their feet, and in their place they would wear the robe of success.

About a year ago, he applied for a pension, but the papers granting the pension arrived only after he had been laid at rest forever.

I have already the bitter taste of death upon my lips. I feel the presence of the heavy weight That will crush out my life within this hour. Order of Red Men, Worcester City Guards and Bay State Division, Uniformed Rank, Knights of Pythias assembled in Continental Hall to do him and Mrs. Yeaw honor. The parties whose wedded life represented just a score of years, were presented with a fine onyx and gold French clock and Miss Mabel Yeaw received an elegant pair of opera glasses. Mr. Yeaw responded happily for all while dancing and games made the night merry for all.

Mr. L. C. Havener of this city, dealer in sporting goods and formerly director of physical training in the Y. M. C. A. is announced as engaged to Rosina L., daughter of Capt. Phineas Pendleton of Searsmont, Me.

Dr. Harry Shaw, son of Joseph Alden Shaw, Principal of the Highland Military School, is reported engaged to Miss Alice, daughter of Deacon Ephraim Whitman. Dr. Shaw is a recently appointed surgeon in the U. S. Army, receiving the position after competitive examination.

The Lady Godiva must have had exceptionally long hair since it completely concealed her lovely person. Since Ayer's Hair Vigor came into use such examples are not so rare as formerly. It not only promotes the growth of the hair, but gives it a rich, silken texture.

We would most respectfully call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Dr. Parker which appears in another column. It certainly commends itself to the judgment of those who wish to take simple and common sense methods as their medicine.

How to save money is a problem that interests everybody. One way to do it is to invigorate the system with Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Being a highly concentrated blood medicine, it is the most powerful and economical. It is sold for a dollar a bottle, but worth five.

Clouds Play Pranks.

Last Tuesday evening about nine o'clock, when the clouds were breaking away after the rain, a peculiar phenomenon was presented which is not often seen. In an upper current of air the clouds were moving very rapidly to the northeast and in an undercurrent other clouds were sailing with equal velocity to the southeast, that is, they crossed each others path at right angles. To make the effect still more striking, the larger clouds passed each other directly in front of the moon, which, being full, illuminated very brilliantly the whole scene.

Mrs Horace W. Bigelow.

The sudden death of this estimable lady, last Sunday morning, calls up the face of her husband, for so many years the senior member of the firm of Bigelow & Longley. They were long residents of the Bay State House. In fact, at her death, Mrs. B. had been there about thirty years, a longer time than any other boarder. Every one who had the pleasure of her acquaintance speaks in the highest terms of her amiable qualities. Her funeral was attended at the parlors of the hotel, Tuesday last at 11 a. m. The Schubert Quartette furnished music, singing to begin with, "Our Life is but a Fading Dawn" after which the Rev. A. E. P. Perkins, D. D. read from the Scriptures and referred to the high esteem in which the deceased was held. After singing, "Abide with Me," the Rev. George W. Phillips of Rutland, Vt., a former pastor of Plymouth Church where Mrs. Bigelow had long been an attendant, spoke feelingly of the part she had borne in church work and life. The exercises concluded with prayer and the hymn "Nearer my God to thee." The burial was in Rural Cemetery.

Andrew O'Connor.

Our local sculptor who is so highly appreciated at home, by certain ones, has sent his late bust of Albert Curtis to the National Academy of Design in New York and it has been admitted. This is a high tribute to Mr. O'Connor one, on account which, his friends unite in heartiest congratulations. The jury to which the work was submitted includes the foremost names in America's art world. For years, the number of rejections has averaged fully two thirds of all applications, and when it is known that this is Mr. O'Connor's first presentation the quality of the honor becomes apparent. The bust of Mr. Curtis is an admirable likeness and, no matter what other marble and plaster work appears our Worcester figure is sure to shine. Among those rulling on Mr. O'Connor's work are J. Carroll Beckwith, the distinguish painter; J. Q. A. Ward the sculptor of The Puritan and the 7th Regiment statue in Central Park; R. Swain Gifford, Walter Shirlaw and many more all Academicians and to whom art is a study, work and life. Thursday and Friday evenings were Varnishing days and the exhibition proper opens next Monday and continues one month. If this recognition will result in placing Mr. O'Connor's name among those whose designs are given consideration and weight, it will be admirable. His work is all right and has been thus for a long time. He needs pushing and assistance. Will Worcester people aid their own citizen and sound his praises wherever and whenever opportunity offers?

Turn Over.

Manuals of correspondence or "complete letter writers" are dangerous things to depend upon. Not many years ago, a young man, who wished to win the hand of a young lady, pondered long over the proper and most effective way of addressing her. At last he found, in a manual of somewhat wide circulation, a form for a letter which pleased him much. The letter bore the title: "From a young gentleman to a young lady making an ardent but dignified offer of marriage." He copied out the letter, signed it with his name; and sent it to the lady. After some days of anxious waiting, he received a letter. He tore open the envelope and read: "Turn over the leaf in your manual; you will find my answer at the top of the opposite page." He seized his manual, and in the place indicated found a brief and sharply formal letter, entitled: "From a young lady to a gentleman, peremptorily refusing an offer of marriage." She was the possessor of a copy of the same manual.

To think one self to be true and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man — Hamlet, Act 1, Scene 3.

Curious Corner.

How Some Insects Sing.

The Greeks shut the cicadas in cages so as to be sung to by them in their sleep. The Greeks were at odds concerning the nature of the singing apparatus and the controversy among naturalists on the subject lasted till very recently. The zoologist, H. Landois, who investigated the difficult subject of animal sounds with ceaseless industry and great skill, was able to give a satisfactory solution to the question. According to his research, the case is one in which the sound is really made by air circulating through passages in the interior of the body.

Every insect's body is penetrated by a system of breathing tubes or trachea which open at places upon the surface. The openings are called stigmata. This system of breathing tubes, through which the air is inspired and expired, takes the place of the lung of the higher animals. Landois discovered them in very obscure parts of the cicada, and found that they form a kind of windpipe representing the actual tone factory of the animals. —R. Francheschini in Popular Science Monthly.

The phrase "castles in the air," has been attributed to Sir Philip Sydney, Swift, Fielding, Churchill, Shenstone. It was first used more than 250 years ago by Robert Burton in his "Anatomy of Melancholy."

How Some Indians Paint.

All our North American Indians paint, and the patterns vary with the individual, with the family and with the occasion. From notes made upon Sacs and Foxes painted for the dance we will give but one or two cases. One man's face was painted black, except around the eyes and mouth, which were scarlet. Upon his forehead was a neat checkered pattern of yellow on the black background. Another's face was divided by a vertical line in two parts—one of which was bright yellow, the other an equally bright green.—Popular Science Monthly.

Very absurd are some of the advertisements which appear in the Agony column of the London Times. Here is one which we read some years ago:

"Come back, Charles! all is explained, dear; the house is sad without you; and your boots, brightly polished, are standing in the hall, wasting their sweetness on the desert air."

Another is a little more practical:
 "To Mary. Come back! All is forgiven; or, if you will not return, do send us the key of the tea caddy?"

Webb's Railroad.

Perhaps no recent Worcester movement betokens more enterprise and energy than Mr. George D. Webb's building of a railroad in Marlboro, N. H., to accommodate his rapidly increasing business. Then the chartering of a special train on the 12th, inst., to carry his friends and fellow business men there was a noteworthy event. The day was serene and so were the visitors. Mr. Webb has the vim to push the heart of the Commonwealth into the forefront of cities. Success to him.

One rounded teaspoonful of Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder does better work than a heaping teaspoonful of any other. Cleveland's is wholesome, leavens best and leavens most.

Good to Eat.

Chicken Salad.

Mix one heaping teaspoonful of fine mustard, the yolk of a fresh egg, one teaspoonful of good cider vinegar, into a smooth paste, using a silver fork for the purpose; measure out twelve tablespoonfuls of fine salad oil, one tablespoonful each of vinegar and lemon juice. Mix the last two together and strain them, add to the egg very slowly while stirring constantly two tablespoonfuls of the oil, and when it thickens, add alternately one teaspoonful of the oil and vinegar, stirring constantly until it is all mixed and a smooth thick, creamy, paste is obtained. Have ready a cold boiled fowl, remove the skin, bones and fat, then pull (not cut) the lean flesh into shreds about the size of dice, then cut into morsels about the same size, about the same quantity of white, crisp, tender celery. Mix it with the meat, add a teaspoonful of salt and one-half the dressing, cover the bottom of an oval platter with the white leaves of blanched lettuce, and place a row of green lettuce leaves around the edge of the platter. Place the salad upon the platter, and pour over it the remainder of the dressing, garnish with a few sprigs of parsley, olives and slices of hard boiled eggs. A salad made this way never fails to give satisfaction. D.

Oatmeal Blanc Mange.

A delicious blanc mange is made by stirring two heaping tablepoons of oatmeal into a very little cold water, then stir with a quart of boiling milk. Let it boil for a few minutes, flavor, and pour into molds to cool, when cream or jelly may be eaten with it.

Potato Soup.

Boil six large pared potatoes in sufficient water. Meanwhile put a quart of milk in a double kettle to boil, with one stalk of celery and an onion. When the potatoes are cooked turn off the water and mash fine and light, then add the boiling milk and a tablespoonful of butter and salt to taste. Rub through a strainer and add a cup of whipped cream. A good substitute for cream is a batter of cornstarch and milk.

Fried Chickens

Wash your chickens, cut them in pieces, season them with pepper and salt. Have in a pan some hot butter and lard mixed; dust some flour over each piece, and fry them slowly till of a bright brown on both sides; take them up, put a little water in a pan, add some butter rolled in flour to thicken the gravy, and more pepper and salt if required. Young Spring chickens are only suitable for frying. Cocoonut Custard.

Add to one quart of boiling milk the beaten yolks of four eggs, two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, and six tablespoonfuls of sugar. Boil till thick, then add one tablespoonful of vanilla, and cover the top with a thick layer of grated cocoonut, sweetened with powdered sugar. This custard to be served with cream.

Lady Fingers.

Beat ten eggs and one pound of sugar very light, sift in a pound and a half of flour with one teaspoonful of baking powder. Squeeze through a confectioner's syringe or paper funnel. Dust with sugar and bake in a moderate oven.

Sick Kidneys,

Dropsy, Swelled Limbs,

Stout People,

Obesity.

THE NEW CURE is proving itself a specific in all forms of kidney affections. It washes out the kidneys, restores to them a healthy action, eliminates the water and gas from the tissues and stomach, and thus reduces swelled limbs and enlarged abdomens to normal proportions. Twenty applications of the cure reduce abdominal measurements from 5 to 11 inches, and at the same time start the kidneys on the sure road to health. With health restored to the kidneys, you find that tired feeling gone, rheumatism gone, shortness of breath disappearing, no more dyspepsia, no more headaches, physical and mental vitality restored, eyes and skin clear. You are a new man or a new woman in feeling and ability. Stout people are delighted with the results obtained from the cure. Sufferers from kidney diseases are loud in their praises of it. The unreasonable man or woman may not be able to comprehend how diseases can be cured and dropsical affections eliminated without dosing the stomach, and in the supremacy of their ignorance they will continue to use slow poisons, and to declare the new cure another scheme to mislead the people. Alas! you poor weak pill-taker! Heven help you in your blind eyes! While you are unable to see, your more intelligent neighbors are singing songs of joy over their rapid and complete recovery of health under the new cure. Continue your willful blindness toward philosophy and reason. Take your pills and nurse your sick kidneys, swelled limbs and enormous abdomens, if you please during the few unhappy years of life that may be given you. The new cure offers you health and happiness, but if you still cling to pills, you must say the penalty for your folly in continued pain and woe.

The new cure should not be confounded with Dr. Hall's Water Treatment, as it is unlike Dr. Hall's method. Free consultations at Darling!

Some names are dangerous. Recently, a very circumspect head of a family called up the firm of contractors and builders, well known as Darling Bros. It was easy for him to call "315 9" But the Central did not get it, so asked over. Again he called "315 6. Darling!" The merry laugh that came back over the wire reminded him that his work might be misconstrued and he really blushed at the thought, "What would Mrs. — say!" It didn't take long for him to talk back, "That wasn't personal, I meant the firm of builders," but that laugh rang in his head for many an hour.

Reception.

Hon. and Mrs. Joseph H. Walker gave a brilliant reception Thursday evening in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Walker of Boston, and Mr. and Mrs. George Walker. The house was beautifully decorated with chrysanthemums and palms. Ingraham's orchestra, from an upper corridor, rendered a varied program during the evening. Among those present were Hon. Samuel Winslow, Hon. and Mrs. Samuel E. Hildreth, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. D. O. Mears, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. G. H. Gould, Col. and Mrs. T. S. Johnson, Col. and Mrs. A. G. Bullock, Col. and Mrs. Henry E. Christmas Work.

A Novel Table Easel, dainty and useful for holding cabinet photographs or cards, can be made from the natural branches of sweet-brier. Select those of uniform thickness, being careful to leave the thorns undisturbed, as they greatly enhance its beauty. Cut a piece sixteen inches long for the back of the easel; two pieces fourteen inches in length for the sides, and another eleven inches long for the bottom. Tie the three longest pieces together, at about five inches from the top, with common, large-sized cord—a smooth cord is preferable—and make double bow knot with ends slightly longer than the loops; a piece of cord about ten inches long is employed for the purpose. Finally, take the remaining piece, and fasten it to the others in the same manner, about three inches from the bottom. The whole is then gilded. —Ingal's Magazine.

A dainty flower table may be made to imitate a sunflower or daisy, and may be painted or the outlines simply indicated with a hot poker. Procure a seasoned piece of board of the proper thickness, and stamp the pattern with paint or powder. Cut out the flower with a fine saw, and smooth all roughness with fine sandpaper. A daisy or sunflower may be represented with close fidelity to nature, or it could be painted in a flat tint with the petals outlined in a contrasting color. A white and gold treatment would be very pretty. Paint the petals with white enamel and outline them with gold. Gild the center and the edges of the petals, and paint the legs to correspond. The legs may be of bamboo, or a tripod may be made of broomsticks. Any kind of wood simply oiled or polished could be used for a table of this kind. The outlines of the petals should be clearly defined with small-pointed hot irons, and the center filled with dots. The pattern, which is fourteen inches square, may be used for a table mat if desired. The petals should be buttonholed in long and short, and the center outlined in the same way and filled with French knots. Cut the edges carefully. A lamp mat may be made in the same way of velvet, satin or felt.—Modern Priscilla.

The little pincushion is a three-cornered one, made of a bit of gold-and-white-striped silk, and stuffed with soft-curl hair that, while it gives it the proper round look, is not as heavy as many of the other stuffings. The edge is outlined by a full frill of deeply-pointed lace, and above this is a loop design wrought out on the lace with gold braid, and making a pretty contrast against its white background. Full loops of white ribbon are at the side corners, and from them come long ends that are just in the center so that the little cushion may swing from the side of a dressing-case, or be suspended from a nail in the wall. In white-headed pins, 1892 is very tastefully wrought out.—Ladies Home Journal.

Mr. Arthur H. Woodcock, for some time, clerk at Fred W. Wellington's enters the Harvard Medical School.

Mr. J. T. Darling, of Darling Brothers is in the South, looking after the interests of the firm there.

Doubt and Faith.

Two travellers, where cross roads meet,
One day, by chance, had greeting;
The face of one with smiles was sweet,
One gave a sigh for greeting.
Above them stood the finger-post;
And on its hands of warning,
Pointing across the boardless coast,
Was printed "To the Morning."
Then spake the traveller forlorn:
"Across the misty meadows
Those hands point falsely 'To the Morn'
Where loom but deepening shadows,"
But Hope looked up, and shook his head:
"Nay truthful is their warning,
There is no sight," but Doubt, he said;
"Faith is immortal morning."
—Selected.

Rebellion Relics.

Only a knife and fork; but they recall vivid memories of war times as their possessor, F. M. Morrison, Esq., shows them. They were once the property of his father, John Morrison, and they saw nearly a year of prison life in Andersonville. John Morrison was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, but his people were from Enniskillen, Ireland. In his earlier days he had worked for Stephen Taft of this city and he was the second Irishman to serve on Worcester's police force. He went west in 1856 and when the War broke out he became a member of the 95th Illinois, which was in Ransom's Brigade, McArthur's Division of the 17th Corps. He was captured June 10, 1864, at Guntown, having been severely wounded. He was supposed to be dead and a pension certificate had been issued to his wife before news of his existence was received. He was through the Vicksburg Campaign and, in all, saw some fifteen engagements. The month of May, '65, when the War was over, he was liberated and though he survived till May, 1875, he was a helpless invalid, the result of prison barbarities. His widow now lives in Princeton.

All Souls Church.

A few years ago the desire to enlarge the Christian church took possession of the hearts of some of the people of the First Universalist Church, and they found the door open at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Martin Russell, No. 10 May Street, and there they laid the foundation upon which the All Souls Church is builded. For nearly a year the sessions of the school were held at this place, and the Rev. M. H. Harris preached as often as he could find the time. Soon after the opening of the school, it became so evident that more commodious quarters would be needed in the immediate future, that Mrs. N. C. Russell and Mrs. Lucy A. Stone began the work of raising funds for a chapel. They were met with a cordial welcome, and so materially aided, that the chapel was soon growing upon the land that had been most generously bestowed upon the infant church by Mrs. Stone.

January 27th, 1885, saw the structure on Kilby Street completed, and it was dedicated that day. Rev. M. H. Harris of the First Universalist Church acting as master of ceremonies, while the sermon was delivered by Rev. B. F. Bowles, a former pastor of the First Church.

To the young society came the Rev. L. H. Fisher, who preached to it during a part of his theological course at Tufts College. Upon his retirement, Rev. Frederick W. Bailey was asked to assume the work, and he spent about two and one half years in this field, when the pastorate became vacant, by his entrance into another communion. During his pastorate, good progress was made in gathering money for the new lot, at the corner of Norwood and Woodland Streets; although the deed for certain reasons, was not passed to the society until nine months ago.

Before the opening of the present pastorate, there was an interregnum of five months. The present pastor, Rev. Francis A. Gray, was called to the work the latter part of April, 1889, and commenced his labors Sunday, May 19.

The need of a new church, which had been felt for a time, became a necessity from the very first of the present pastorate, and plans were presented and discussed as to how a permanent church might be obtained. At length at a parish meeting, held in the latter part of 1890, all former plans were dismissed and the pastor was instructed to procure plans for a moderate cost church, that should be adequate to the demands of the growing parish. Plans, prepared by Arthur F. Gray of Boston, were adopted, and a building committee, consisting of Messrs. S. D. Houghton, H. H. Dyke, C. F. Marsh, A. A. Blaney, J. J. Upham and Rev. F. A. Gray was appointed. It was deemed by the committee, inexpedient to commence construction so late in the Fall; but as early as matters could be arranged, the work of building was put forward in the early Spring. The first earth was removed May 7, of this present year, the corner-stone was laid with impressive ceremonies June 3rd, and so rapidly has everything been accomplished that the new church stands today complete from foundation to spire, aside from such small matters on foundation and grounds as must be carried over to another Spring.

There has been many seasons of happiness and spiritual quickening in the old home. There have been nineteen baptisms of children this year, while nine adults have united with the church. The last service, was held in the chapel on Kilby Street Sunday, Oct. 11, and the next Sunday, the lecture rooms of the new church were occupied for the first time. Increasing audiences and augmenting Sunday schools point to a steady and healthy growth in all the lines of activity. The people rejoice in the beauties of the new structure, and are ready to follow the lead of their pastor, in the work of winning the world to Christ and God. All signs point to a fine large parish and a working church in the new the All Souls Universalist Church.

He is a Bay Stater by birth, and dates back through several generations to the very early colonial days, his ancestors having come hither from Scotland. In the rugged, seagirt county of Essex, in the old witch-haunted region of Danvers, the subject of this sketch first saw the light of day, August 9, 1857. His parents were S. Fairchild and Abigail (Whitehouse) Gray, who still make their home in that town. His father is a brick manufacturer, still actively engaged in that pursuit of life. He has four sisters and one brother, Arthur F. Gray, civil engineer and architect of Boston.

Life flowed on in the usual course, school-life holding the attention of the lad constantly, until the age of fifteen years had been reached, at which time, he was graduated from the Holton High School of Danvers. After this he followed a year or two, in the business of his father, and at seventeen he was again in school at a private institution in the city of Lynn. About this time, he decided to make of himself a teacher, so with this object in view, he sought and gained admission to the State Normal School in Bridgewater, Mass., from which at the close of two years time, he graduated and returned to his native town to occupy the place of head-master of one of the grammar schools. After a brief period of successful labor in this position, ill health compelled a resignation and sojourn in the West for nearly two years to regain health. In southern Illinois he found that which he sought, and soon after his return to Massachusetts, sought again to enter upon a public career. Through the advice and counsel of his pastor, he then repaired (in 1880) to the theological department of the St. Lawrence University in Canton, New York, determined to fit himself for the ministry of the Universalist Church. He completed his course of study, June 29, 1883, and the next Sunday took up the work of the ministry, since which time he has not seen an idle Sunday. His first settlement was in the city of Lockport, in western New York, where he received the rite of ordination July 26, 1883. Here he served three years, and was then called to the care of the Universalist Church in Arlington, a suburb of Boston. He married July 27, 1886, Miss Emma T. Walter of Lockport, and took up his residence and work at Arlington the first of September. Here he became closely identified with the town's interests, and zealous for its welfare. During this pastorate, he organized under the direction of the State Convention of Universalists, a movement in West Medford. In the Spring of 1889, the work at Arlington and West Medford was yielded, and the important work of fostering and strengthening the new, struggling church in Worcester, was entered upon. Time has passed swiftly away, and the end had in view when called to this field, has been realized in the new church, which has been dedicated this week. Mr. Gray resides at 23 May Street and is every way delighted with the city, and hopes to labor for many years in the upbuilding of true religion in the hearts of the people, a religion not merely of doctrine and belief but a life of help and service.

Description of Edifice.

The building, which is of frame with an underpinning of granite block work, furnished by Ballard Bros. of this city, stands on a commanding corner lot, and while the architect has not endeavored to produce a building in any particular style, yet the combination is quite pleasing.

At the northwest corner is the main tower and porch entered from both streets; the tower is 14 1/2 feet square with a pyramidal roof and its vane rises to a height of 75 feet above the sidewalk. This tower furnishes access to gallery and one of the entrances to the cloister which extends across the entire front of the auditorium from which it is separated by a plate glass partition. The Sunday School rooms have a separate entrance from Woodland Street while the pastor's study is reached from Norwood Street by another entrance.

The building has an extreme depth of 84 feet and a frontage on Woodland Street of 85 feet.

The main floor contains an auditorium 40x65 feet and adjoining a Sunday School room 30x40, which is separated by a sliding glazed partition allowing of throwing the two rooms together when required, a gallery seating 70 people with balustrated iron extends across the rear of auditorium, while the main floor seats 330 and the adjoining room 200, thus providing 650 sittings. Adjoining the Sunday School rooms and with floor raised two feet above is the infant class room 14 1/2 x 28. This room opens into Sunday School room by folding doors, the opening being provided with a border light and foot lights, rendering it available as a stage for entertainments. The Sunday School library arranged upon the post office plan is conveniently located and adjoining is a ladies parlor 17x19 with large open fireplace and oak mantel.

In the basement are toilet rooms, dressing rooms, rooms for heating apparatus, and fuel and a dining room 30x40 feet with kitchen 15x22 feet with pantry arrangements fitted up in the most convenient manner.

The auditorium, 40x65 feet and 22 feet high, has the finish of quartered oak, stereo-relief work and carved wood enter largely into the decorations, the wall spaces are appropriately colored, and the windows are filled with stained glass of tasty designs and in rich coloring, those over the choir and back of the communion table being particularly noticeable. These include a "Descending Dove in Halo" and "Sir Joshua Reynolds' Cherubs" and do great credit to Phipps Slocum & Co. of Boston who executed them. The decorations are by Mr. Chas. C. Minsch of Worcester and have been carried out in a pleasing manner. Back of the chancel wall is the organ with the chairs built into its face and key-board at end, the arcade finish of chancel is extended across front of organ with good effect, it is also used in the railing of choir. The organ is from the well known builder, Geo. S. Hutchings of Boston and is a fine instrument in every particular. The furniture, specially designed for the chancel, was built by Wm. Richmond of Boston, and the chairs which are of the opera type with pew ends were made by C. B. Demorest & Co. of Brooklyn.

The cloister, entrance halls, vestibules and tower are finished in ash, the ladies parlor in oak, and all other parts in whitewood; all are tastefully decorated.

Arrangements have been made to light with gas and electricity throughout, and combination fixtures in polished steel have been used, McKenney and Waterbury of Boston furnishing the goods.

The greatest care has been given to arrangements of heating, ventilation and plumbing, and the building reflects much credit upon the builder, Geo. Kingston, as well as upon the architect, Arthur F. Gray of Exchange Building, Boston, who has given the structure his careful supervision, and to whom the admirably arranged plan is due.

Miss Lizzie F. Fannell of Fitchburg, a former pupil of Ben Hammond, will soon join the Denman Thompson Company.

O'Gara—Gleason.

A pleasant wedding was had at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, last Wednesday. The contracting parties were Albert O'Gara, son of Thomas O'Gara, the well known slate roofer, and Miss Anna A. Gleason. The Rev. Robert Walsh was the clergyman officiating, while James McGrath was best man and Miss Catherine Ryan bridesmaid.

A very pleasant feature in the O'Gara wedding was the reception of a silver fruit dish from A. F. Nail of Mansfield, Ohio, who as Uncle Joe in the "Drummer Boy" is well known in Worcester and who in his Worcester stays has been a guest of the O'Gara's.

O'Connor—Murray.

The marriage of Mr. M. T. O'Connor and Miss Minnie S. Murray took place at St. John's Catholic Church Thursday morning, and was largely attended by the friends and relatives of the contracting parties. Rev. Mgr. Griffin celebrated the Nuptial Mass and performed the ceremony. The wedding march was played by Miss Norah Reidy, the church organist. Mr. John O'Connor, a student of Holy Cross College and brother of the groom, was best man, and Miss Maggie C. Murray, a sister of the bride was bridesmaid. Immediately after the ceremony a wedding breakfast was served at the home of the bride's parents, No. 56 Temple Street, at which Reboli was the caterer. The happy couple left on an early train for New York on a wedding tour, after which they will be "at home" to their friends at No. 25 Portland Street.

The eleventh semi-annual exhibition of the Art Students' Club opened Monday evening in the club's gallery in the Walker Building and will continue until Thanksgiving evening. It is open during the entire day and evening.

Fortieth Anniversary.

The friends and neighbors of H. J. Allen and wife of the Chamberlain district met with them last Wednesday evening to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the latter's marriage. A supper was served to the seventy-five present and in behalf of their friends, Mayor Harrington presented the couple with an elegant sideboard, hat-tree, parlor lamp and other articles.

To prevent choking let the person swallow the white of one or more eggs. The white of the egg adheres to the obstacle in the throat and causes it to be easily removed.

If a person is threatened with fainting bathe the head with warm water instead of cold.

Convulsions may frequently be cut short by simply turning the patient on the left side. The nausea, as an after-effect of chloroform, may generally be controlled by the same means.

We often hear mothers say when their infants vomit up curd that the milk they have taken does not agree with them, but the truth is that the milk in the stomach always curdles before it digests. If it did not curdle, it would show that the stomach was weak. Infants fed at regular intervals are less apt to overfeed than those fed at irregular hours. Mothers sometimes ask why human milk is more digestible than cows' milk. There are two principal reasons; one is the curd is harder and the quantity is greater in cows milk, while the curd or casein in the mother's milk is more porous, and thus, more easily digested. D.

There is an old saying that a woman can throw out with a spoon faster than a man can throw in with a shovel. Without reference to the apparent injustice of the comparison between the two sexes, it must be admitted that the thriftiness of the family depends as much upon the economy of the house-mother as upon the industry of the wage-earner. No one should despise small economies, though it is not an economy to use up a dollar's worth of time in order to save a tuppenny worth of material. Clothes may be patched and mended to that extent that it were actual saving of money to buy new material rather than to put so much new cloth on old garments. Despite all this, there is not the least excuse for any woman allowing any particle of good nourishing food to be thrown away. It is just as easy to cook the meat that has been cooked before as it is to cook fresh meat.

Home-made Dish-mops.

Very good substitutes for the "boughten" dish mops may be easily made by fastening to wooden handles some of the fringe with which home-made counterpanes were formerly bordered. Such a quantity of this may be found in some old homes, that it is well to utilize it in some way. I make this suggestion for the benefit of the "penny-wise," and those who live at a distance from shops where such things may be purchased.

Benjamin Hazen Rugg.

The death of this gentleman, Saturday last, has carried sadness into many homes, for his was a well known figure in Grace Church to which he had belonged, almost from the beginning.

Mr. Rugg was born in Lancaster, Mass., Dec. 29, 1816 one of the fourteen children who made up the family of Joseph and Mary (Hazen) Rugg. The Rugg family was long identified with the town for we find, in 1696, that John Rugg, a freeman, died and that the following year his widow was slain by the Indians. At the same time, his son Joseph with three children suffered a like fate. The descent from the first settler was through his son, John or Joseph, to Daniel, Sr., Daniel, Jr., and Joseph who was born in 1771, and was married to Mary Hazen Nov. 29, 1792, very near one hundred years ago.

Mr. Rugg was reared on a farm and as a young man was interested in the making of canes in Gardner; later he kept a store and afterwards went into the business of selling stationery which he followed to the time of his death, coming in from his last trip only a few weeks ago. He came to Worcester in 1865, and almost from the date of founding Grace Church, he has been a firm and devoted adherent to her interests. He has long been a prominent member of the Official Board and at his death, was a Trustee. There was no project for furthering the prospects of Grace Church that he was not prominent in. His wife who survives him was Miss Sarah Eaton, a native of Greenwood, near Wakefield. They had but one child, George, who is the wife of Mr. James T. Hoey of this city.

Mr. Rugg was a man of massive frame, one of the largest in this city and stature was a family characteristic. Weighing in the vicinity of three hundred pounds he has been heard to say that he was the smallest of several brothers, yet the mother of these giants was a small woman. His health has not been good since a trouble had with one of his hands, a little more than a year ago, a trouble that resulted in the loss of a finger. He was content in his work and duties to the end. He leaves, in addition to those mentioned a niece, Mrs. Azariah Ware of Russell Street and two sisters in Leominster, Mrs. Harriet Spaulding and Miss Julia Rugg. The funeral was held at his late residence, No. 41 Russell Street, on Monday last at 3 p. m. his pastor, the Rev. W. T. Worth, officiating. Music was furnished by the Grace Church choir and a large number of friends assembled to pay their last respects. The burial was in Wakefield, among Mrs. Rugg's relatives.

The Rev. Henry T. Cheever issues a manifesto to Worcester Republicans. Dr. Cheever is nothing if not intense. He has long been prominent as a champion of temperance within the Republican party.

GOOD HUSBAND.

Good husband one who rules his circle dear,
By right example, and true love, not fear,
Lives not unmindful of a trusting spouse,
Of courtship promises and marriage vows
Partakes with her 'for better or for worse.'
One love, one home, one confidence, one purse,
Leaves words and acts, quiet, to a distant date,
Wise sons may proudly quote, and safely imitate.

What Say You, Gentlemen;

Shall It Be Good Clothing,
Or Shall It Be Prices?

There are a great many different ways to manufacture Clothing.

There is a great difference in Cloths to be given with.

If a manufacturer buys the cheapest cloths and trimmings, and puts them together by the cheapest processes known to the trade, he will produce thousands of Suits of what he calls "Clothes" for a very little money.

Another manufacturer finds out where the best Cloths are made, where the best trimmings are to be had and then combines them by the best processes known, and he produces clothing that he may sell with confidence, and you can buy with confidence every day in the year.

One maker might buy the same Cloth, and the same trimmings, and might make as good Clothes if he only knew how.

One man takes a bar of iron, and from it fashions things so fine and delicate as to win your delighted wonder.

But all men could not do this, no matter how much they might try.

The markets of the world are open to all makers of Clothing. One man's money is as good as another's; all have an equal chance at this start.

If then there is a decided difference in price, and one dealer offers you goods at ever so much less than others, you had better look for the cause in lower quality of cloth and trimmings, less care in the processes of manufacture and the use of unskilled and poorly paid labor.

The manufacturer of high quality Clothing could—if he would—make the low quality also.

But it is very doubtful if the maker of the common kinds could ever make the higher;

it would depend upon whether his previous efforts had not unfitted him for the success in the better way.

The great question after all is whether or no you prefer

Honest Cloths,
Honest Made Garments
And Honest Prices,

Or whether you prefer to go in the old way of thinking you get something for nothing, and to have the old dissatisfaction over again.

We Guarantee THE CLOTH,
We Guarantee THE TRIMMINGS,
We Guarantee OUR STYLE.

And guarantee that the clothes we sell you will cost you less for every week of good service than the kinds so often urged upon you at less prices.

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, NOVEMBER, 28, 1891.

No. 13

I thank Thee, gracious Lord,
For the divine award
Of strength that helps me up the heavy heights
Of mortal sorrow, where, through tears-forlorn
My eyes get glimpses of the authentic lights
Of love's eternal morn.

And I would make thanksgiving
For the sweet double living,
That gives the pleasures that have passed away
The sweetness and the sunshine of today.

Thanksgiving Day.

From 1621, or the first autumn at Plymouth, Massachusetts has not failed to observe the annual feast.

In many ways, the ideas projected from "that stern and rock bound coast" have permeated the nation.

While, in later years, many may observe little more than the form yet that is a pleasant reminder of the gratitude that filled our ancestors' hearts over their freedom from persecution.

What a fortunate circumstance it was that scarcity of meat rendered it necessary to use the wild turkeys with which the Plymouth woods abounded! From that day to this, the bird has borne a prominent part in the day's doings.

So important even has been its position that there are those who say that the turkey, rather than the eagle, should be our national bird. And is there not some justice in the suggestion? It is a proud spirited animal, without being rapacious, and he is, in the highest degree, useful. But of the eagle, what more can be said than that he is a fierce, predacious old robber. We might do worse than to make an exchange.

After all, does it not seem a little odd that the Governor's proclamation comes just the same whether we have been fortunate or unfortunate? Death may have invaded our household, business reverses may have overtaken us, all our plans may have miscarried; still with unfailing regularity we are enjoined to meet and to give thanks. This last clause must be especially concurring to some, for it is, really, about all they ever do give. Even "Old Hunks" himself can be generous in this way.

Through perils from domestic and foreign foes, through calamities of fire and pestilence, even when the spoken words were well nigh choked by rising sob, the sons and daughters of the Bay State have not forgotten the customs of their fathers. The spirit is inborn and has strengthened with advancing years. Permanent harm cannot come to that people who thus retain a habit which was the result of deeply fixed piety, an unswerving devotion to the eternal principles of right. The New England Thanksgiving is a God given and a divinely blessed institution.

Today, there are few states in this Union that do not observe New England's Festival. Whether settled by Puritan or Cavalier, by French, Spanish or Dutch, all have caught the fervor of the Plymouth Pilgrims and from the woods of Arrostook to Puget's Sound, there are not wanting the glad, family gathering; the song, the reminiscence, the renewed brightness in the eye of age and the glad flush of childhood and youth. Whatever may perish from our national ways and characteristics, let us hope and pray the ever retention of Thanksgiving Day.

Nor would we have it at a different time in the year. If the day chances to be bright and clear, no trace as yet of snow upon the ground, why we may simply remark the difference between this and that, and say, "It is so unusual." But if, as often happens, Winter has seized the land in his icy clasp and skating is found upon the ponds and streams, what can give to happy fireside a more cheerful glow than the thought of the cold without? Vigorous manhood will not shrink from the encounter, but to him, even, the indoors is attractive. The time of the year is all right. We, all, love Thanksgiving.

Howell's Thanksgiving hymn—a complete gem, with neither a superfluous word nor thought nor any one missing,—is a worthy pendant to the antique Herbert verses on Lent:

Thanksgiving.

Lord, for the erring thought
Not into evil wrought;
Lord, for the wicked will Betrayed and baffled still;
For the heart from itself kept,
Our thanksgiving accept.

For ignorant hopes that were Broken to our blind prayer;
For pain, death, sorrow sent Unto our chastisement;
For all love of seeming good,
Quicken our gratitude.

Benjamin H. Rugg Memorial.

At a meeting of the official board of Grace Church, Sunday, the following was adopted in memory of Benjamin H. Rugg:—

"Friend after friend departs;
Who hath not lost a friend?
There is no union here of hearts
That finds not here an end."

But the Christian looks beyond the "here" to the hereafter, and there sees many a glad reunion, many a hand-grasping, looked forward to after a final leave-taking in this life. There are those who impress themselves by native nobility, by manly, upright lives, by natural dignity and presence, by an ever present gladness of heart and face that communicates itself to every one who comes within its influence. Such an one was Benjamin H. Rugg, the Christian brother whom we of Grace Church must ever remember with most affec-
